I have heard pianists, for example, who are really good pianists, either for overture, orchestra or as an instructor, good sight-readers with good execution and harmonic ideas, but they fall flat when describing a picture. They lack that continuous flow of natural improvising that the born but uncultured pianist exhibits.

I have been in many of the leading "motion picture vaudeville" houses throughout the country and observed this condition in the better-class houses, strange to say.

I have a very good friend who follows the business as his vocation. He literally "reads" anything. A first-class vaudeville pianist, but is lost as soon as the pictures begin to flicker on the screen.

Now, Mr. Manager, once more take a fool's advice and give this part of your business as much consideration as you do your operator or the pictures themselves.

L. SHAW, JR.

I do not fully agree on the last part of Mr. Shaw's letter. It is a mistake to think that the operator is better treated than the musicians, or that the manager is a better judge of pictures.

The manager who cannot appreciate good music, who cannot tell the difference between a piano smasher and an artist able to play the picture, does not know what a good picture is, nor can he judge a good projection.

The truth is that the operator is the worse treated in a small, suffocating booth in which he can scarcely turn around.

J. M. B.

William Fox, the vaudeville magnate, has arranged to present in each of his houses, of the better class, two of the Hepworth features handled in America by Albert Blinkhorn. These are "David Copperfield" in seven reels and "Kissing Cup," a four-part racing melodrama with automobile and aeroplane complications.

Albert Blinkhorn, American agent for some of the biggest of the English feature film manufacturers, has made arrangements by which he will soon be able to offer two single reels every week to the trade. One reel is to be a drama and the other a split comedy and scenic.

Appearance and Manners

Suggestions Invited, Questions Cheerfully Answered

Address: Exhibitors' Department, The Motion Picture News

New York, N. Y, Oct. 27, 1913.
Editor Motion Picture News,
Exhibitors' Department.
Dear Sir:

I notice in your issue of the first a statement under the heading of, "Appearance and Manners," that you visited a new theatre where the attendants were neither efficient nor courteous and seemed thoroughly out of place in a picture theatre. The reason you give for this is that they were a class that would work for a low salary.

I thank you on behalf of the motion picture exhibitors of Greater New York for taking this matter up, as it is really one of the drawbacks that we have been trying to remedy, as a low-salaried man cannot be beneficial to the employer or to the public in general, and the discourteous treatment received by patrons of those theatres has been a sufficient drawback to make the exhibitors who know their business wish that some trade journal had taken this matter up before.

I sincerely hope you will keep up this good work, and go after these proprietors, and I think it will do some good were you to mention the names of the places you visit and find this class of attendants.

Again thanking you for the interest taken in the exhibitor and wishing your paper all the success it deserves.

Respectfully yours,
SAMUEL H. TRIGGER,
President of Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York, Incorporated.

IN the management of a theatre there are many small details which do not seem to be of much importance to the exhibitor, yet are noticed by the patrons and cause an unfavorable impression.

Is it not cheap and in very poor taste to throw on a screen, beautifully surrounded by draperies and decorations, an ugly stencil slide showing the style of writing often found on shipping boxes?

Slides and Banners

These stencil slides have been invented to please the managers who do not want to spend any money on the appearance of their theatre. No, they are not stingy, because while they object to paying thirty-five or fifty cents per day for an announcement glass slide, they spend two or three dollars on an ugly banner to deface the appearance of the lobby.

The ugly banner cheapens the appearance of the theatre, while a neat glass slide can give the impression of refinement which means so much to the success of a photoplay house.

While the metal or paper stencil slides are in poor taste, the hand-written slides are still worse, as few managers or operators are good penmen and spellers.

The glass slide has a drawback—the breakage—and this amounts to a rather high item when the slides are in the hands of careless operators.

The glass slides break because the operator allows them to remain exposed too long to the heat of the lamp-house. Another cause of breakage is from exposing the slides to a draught. Many slides crack when the operator places them in the carrier before giving them the chance to assume the temperature of the room, or when they are still damp from a cleaning. Many operators keep the slides on the table of the machine to keep them at a certain temperature, and while this practice can save many slides from cracking, the operators do not save much, as they drop too many slides on the floor.

Revolving Disk Saves Slides

A manager should have a stereopticon with a revolving disk and he would save many slides.

The discarding of the glass slides came at a bad time, or, to be correct, when the slide makers, after realizing the large field open to them, had started to improve the subjects and the colors.

We know that while the slide makers were producing some very fine slides for lectures, they were somewhat crude in their first announcement and song slides.

For the last few years slides have improved in both designs and colors, and we have to-day some very artistic announcement slides, beautiful slides which not only please but rest the eye from the flickers of the film. Some of these announcement slides are a real relief to the eyes of the patron which have been strained by watching a long feature.

The beautiful announcement glass colored slides add to the refinement of the show and are a certain mark of courteous attention to the patrons.

I encourage the announcement glass slide in preference to the stencil or poorly hand-written slide, because I am for the good appearance of a theatre, as I believe that the good pictures of to-day need a good frame to maintain the better patronage.

While visiting the theatres of Indianapolis I have been pleased to see that most of them stick to the glass slide Indianapolis has a large number of refined photoplay houses which would be ornaments to New York and Chicago. They are not only fine buildings, but are managed in such a manner as to secure the best patronage.

I have seen in these theatres some beautiful announcement slides from the Niagara Slide Company, of Lockport, N. Y.

Columbus Theatres Decreasing

They come and they go. Each time I visit Columbus, O., I find some new motion picture theatres, while I fail to find some of the old ones. Columbus is not an exception, as in most of the towns we find constant changes. Yet the number of theatres is fast decreasing, as Columbus is not building enough new houses to replace the ones going out of business.

There is a reason. It is very simple. We have too many persons afflicted with a small capital and no experience, who go into the motion picture show business with the belief that it is a gold mine. A few weeks are enough to show them their mistake, and then, to save their investment, they try to ruin their competitors by showing long programs and by offering many inducements, with the result that they put themselves out of business.

Max Stearn is the pioneer exhibitor of Columbus, and a very successful one. Mr. Stearn had to face many competitors, but while he has seen them fall by the wayside he has paid no attention to them. He did not try to put them out of business by following their example.

Mr. Stearn remained cool. He stuck to his common-sense policy. He did not increase his program nor deface the façade of his theatre with an abuse of ugly posters, nor add a full orchestra, pipe-organ or souvenirs. Mr. Stearn continued to maintain the most refined photoplay house in Columbus. He shows the best selected pictures. He has them well projected and accompanied by appropriate music.

The success of Mr. Stearn is due to his strict policy on appearance and manners. His attendants are clean-cut fellows of good appearance, excellent manners and very courteous. The posters are all placed in well-polished brass frames.

While the "Exhibit," the theatre of Mr. Stearn, is the oldest one (seven years old), it is still the refined photoplay house of Columbus.

Max Stearn made a great success of his enterprise, and as he claims he owes much to the support of the people of Columbus, he is building a most beautiful theatre to seat twelve hundred persons and to show straight pictures only.

Mr. Stearn an Example

As I have talked much on appearance and manners, I take pleasure in giving Mr. Stearn as an example of an exhibitor who can stick to his policy and not allow himself to be tempted by this demon of petty jealousy, which has done so much to ruin many exhibitors. In closing I must say that Mr. Max Stearn is highly respected by his competitors, as they all recognize the owner of the Exhibit theatre, the perfect gentleman showman. J. M. B.

IN RE HELEN GARDNER

The Helen Gardner Picture Players have made a contract to produce twelve three-thousand-foot dramas, which will be released on the Warner's Features program. The first will be "A Daughter of Pan," and will be followed by a subject dealing with modern Russian life.

The Helen Gardner pictures are made for the Helgar Corporation, which firm will turn the dozen three-act films over to Warner's Features. However, during the coming year it is planned to make four or six eight-act pictures in addition to those made for Warner's Features.

"Making a Mayor"

A Striking Title and a Film Which Educates Politically

WITH woman suffrage a theme of eternal discussion, together with the particularly keen political warfare waged in New York State and city, a film depicting faithfully and accurately the career of a vote is one of poignant interest to the holder of the suffrage franchise, as well as to possible holders, male and female. The fact of a film having been taken under special privilege always adds to its value, and the privilege granted to the Fair Feature Sales Company to take motion pictures in the hitherto forbidden regions where the votes are assembled that make mayors adds ten-fold to its value as an educational archive.

"Making a Mayor; How the Metropolis Elects Its Executive; New York's Liveliest Day and Busiest Night" is the title trinity of this subject, which is being sold on the open-market basis. It shows, among other things, the various important personages of the campaign, Sulzer, Whitman, McCall and others, in the course of their daily duties, or engaged in coercing voters into the straight and narrow way of political preference.

There are glimpses of the activities of women campaigners for the Fusion cause, among them Mrs. Charles Dana Gibson, wife of the artist. Also a fraction of a hundred feet showing how the women will vote when they get a chance. The latter scenes were taken at Columbus Circle, New York City, on election day. They report the mock election which women there carried on.

Each step incidental to the evolution of a vote, from its germinal impulse to vote for this or that party as influenced by stump speech, eloquence or by traditional custom, to the summing up in Police Headquarters of the returns, is shown. For the women who constitute such a large portion of the motion picture audiences these scenes will be interesting.

Election night has become a polite synonym for "riot." To illustrate these scenes of revelry, scenes have been taken of the excited interiors of two of the most important cafés and "places de danse." Here widely-known actresses and men of affairs are seen in the mazes of the turkey-trot, poetically described by Roy L. McCardell as "the poultry of motion."

KLEINE OFFICIAL ORDERS NEW CONDENSER

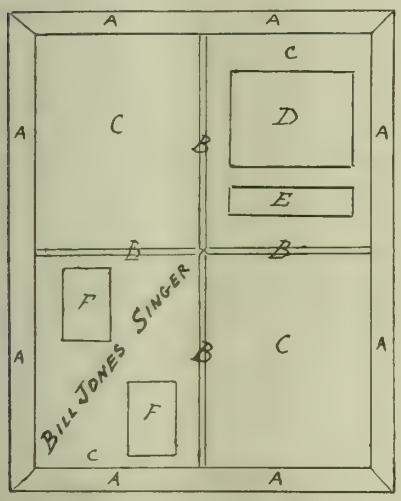
A large consignment of a new variety of condensers has arrived at the Chicago offices of the Kleine Optical Company and are now being offered for sale. Manager Frank Hough claims that this particular condenser is an actual lense made of optical glass and cannot discolor, as is the case with the common glass usually molded into lenses.

SCENE FROM "THE SUBTERRANEAN CITY."—KLEINE-ECLIPSE

Advertising the Picture

IN describing the Regent theatre, of New York; the Bijou Dream, of Boston; the Bijou, of Springfield, Mass., and other theatres I have often said that these houses are very prosperous and command the best patronage by refusing to display posters.

I have found another house, the Pitt, where posters are unknown, but replaced by the most refined advertising frame, as shown in the accompanying illustration.



A. A. is a wide brass frame.

B. B. are brass cross-bars, dividing the frame into four sections.

C. C. The four sections can be covered with velvet or any other material or plain cardboard, white or colored. These four sections are used to advertise the pictures, singer or other features.

D shows the plan for a photo of an actual scene of the film to be shown.

E shows a space for a short synopsis or title of the film to be shown.

F F shows the photographs of the singer.

The exhibitor is not restricted to one large photo per section. He can place a number of smaller ones or photographs of actors.

On the other hand, I would not advise any one to use too many photographs or descriptions. The artistic appearance of an advertising display should be maintained. It is an advertisement that appeals to the better element and that is sure to bring good results.

Such a frame can be seen from across the street, and is so attractive as to induce many persons to cross the street. I cannot say so good a word for the six-sheet posters. They are so ugly at a distance that persons on the opposite sidewalk merely glance at them and say, "Another of those cheap places."

Posters, banners and signs are not the only medium to advertise the show. Good clean films speak louder than posters.

"Rainy" Films a Poor Ad

Dirty or "rainy" films are a mighty poor advertisement, as the patrons carry out the news that the theatre is showing old films. In many cases the films are not old, but they are full of dirt from the constant handling by careless operators. If the machine is not cleaned the film will gather all the dirt and old oil.

The general cause is in the rewinding, as too often this work is done by boys, who let the film drag on a dirty table and even on the floor.

The streaks shown on the curtain are not always scratches, as few films are scratched. The film, on passing through the machine, gathers more or less old oil and the dirt falling on the greasy surface is not dusted away as the film passes over the sprockets, but sticks and forms, with the old oil, a sort of soft dirt which spreads the whole length of the film and causes the streaks seen on the screen, vulgarly called "rainstorms."

The film should be cleaned. If the reader could be fortunate to assist to the demonstration I had the other day in Columbus, O., he would be surprised to see the amount of dirt a film can gather within a few weeks.

I have been shown many film cleaners, film renovators, all with good and bad points.

This machine has passed the experimental stage as one machine has been in constant operation for the last fifteen months at a Columbus film exchange now controlled by the Mutual Film Corporation.

This machine is the large model made for the benefit of the film manufacturers and firm renters. Mr. Hanish has perfected a smaller model for the exhibitor.

On the large machine, three reels can be cleaned at the same time. The film passes between several sets of drums and rollers with no undue strain on the film. No acid or preparations are used but the drums are covered with heavy white muslin on which the dirt from the film sticks. When the film is released from the machine, it is perfectly clean and soft.

Small Machine for Exhibitor

The smaller machine, the one for the exhibitor, is to be connected with the rewinder and is not intended to clean old dirty films, but to keep the film in good condition by removing at each rewinding the fresh oil and dirt.

With a good renovating machine, the renter can increase the life of his films as in most cases the exhibitor does not object to the age of the film but he does not want rainy pictures. When films are relieved of a coat of sticky dirt, they run more smoothly through the machine, consequently are less liable to break.

The feature renters and the state right buyers should welcome such a machine, as they would double the life of the copies in their possession.

Clean films are the advertisement.

The other day I visited a theatre and when a Vitagraph film was flashed on the screen, a lady next to me said, "This is an old film." I could not blame her as the film was very dirty, yet I was surprised as I knew the house shows only films from three to five days old.

I consulted the release page and found that the film was four days old. As the film was not dirty all the way through, I came to the conclusion that the rewinder had met an accident, had dropped part of the film on the floor and had perhaps walked over a section of it by mere accident. The film was not dirty from age as some six hundred feet were clear.

EDUCATION BOARD ENDORSES KLEINE "POMPEII"

The Board of Education of the City of New York has endorsed George Kleine's production of the Ambrosio version of "The Last Days of Pompeii," now playing at the Bijou Theatre, for teachers and pupils of all the grades of the public school system, as being of superior quality and a valuable aid in the pursuit of their studies, particularly of that period in Roman history in which the action of the story occurs.

Neff on Ohio Censor Situation

THE following communication has been received from M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America:

"A suit has been started in the United States Federal Court in Cleveland, Ohio, to test the constitutionality of the motion picture censor law in the State of Ohio. The State Censor Board being under the State Industrial Commission, which has charge of the administration of the act, will not attempt to enforce the penal section until after the fourth day of December. This action was decided upon by Attorney-General T. S. Hogan and Wallace Yaple, chairman of the Industrial Commission. A resolution will be spread upon the minutes of the commission directing there be no prosecution until after December 4, or until the suit is decided.

"This action was taken by Attorney-General T. S. Hogan to obviate the necessity for a temporary restraining order, or an injunction, which was asked for by those who attacked the law. Possibly if the enemies of the Censor bill would have known what a great favor they were doing the Censor Board, they would have hesitated, as the Censor Board has been working night and day to have a sufficient number of films censored so none of the exhibitors in the State would be inconvenienced. The thirty days will give them ample and sufficient time to censor every film in the State, and be right up to the minute with their work.

It is stated by those attacking the State Censor law that they desire to have municipal police censorship instead of a state or national censorship, but under any and all conditions they are opposed to any legally constituted censor board. The exhibitors of Ohio are very greatly surprised. There are all kinds of reasons given.

"After all the reasons are given, pro and con, the fact still remains that if the present censor law is declared unconstitutional when the Ohio State Legislature meets in January they will possibly pass a law that will stand the test of the State and national constitution. Now that the agitation is started in Ohio there will be one of two things, either a State censor board, or every municipality in the State of Ohio will have a local censor board, whether composed of police officers, preachers, lawyers, doctors or other persons.

"Cincinnati, through the Board of Public Safety, has established a censor board for vaudeville and dramatic plays, composed of one or two preachers, a priest, a city official and one woman. If Ohio did not have a State censor law, the same power that appoints a censor board for the dramatic vaudeville plays would appoint a police censor board for censoring.

"This reasoning ought to convey the deplorable condition in which it would place the exhibitors of Cincinnati. If we are to have a censor board, let it be as broad, liberal and intelligent as it is possible to secure."

League in Bay State

Massachusetts Soon to Have Organization, Says President Neff

ACCORDING to statements of M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, it is likely that Massachusetts will soon have a State branch of the national organization. Mr. Neff has conferred with George F. Washburn, of the Unique Theatre, 700 Washington street, and several other exhibitors. Mr. Washburn is now in charge of the organization in Massachusetts.

"While the number may not be large," said Mr. Neff, "I expect that Massachusetts exhibitors will soon be organized into a vigorous and harmonious branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. The difficulty of organizing the State lies in the fact that the western part of the State gets its film service from New York, while the theatres in the eastern part and handled from Boston.

"Boston has, I am told, only thirty-two motion picture theatres. Many of these show eight or ten pictures for one admission, while some show six acts of vaudeville and eight pictures for ten cents. My policy has always been three reels for five cents and four for ten cents, no more than four under any conditions."

The film booking agent of the Marcus Loew Theatrical Circuit has contracted with J. Weinberg, of Weinberg's Features, New York City, for thirty-four consecutive days on "The Missing Woman," the Film Releases of America subject.

GETTING INTO PERSONAL TOUCH WITH THE PATRONS

How to Make Friends of Customers by the Co-operation of all Concerned

By E. J. HUDSON

The Exhibitor The employees look to the exhibitor for their standard in all things pertaining to their work.

Begin by being courteous. That, in turn, will make them courteous to patrons. Don't be a word miser. A jovial, breezy "good morning" to each person on your payroll means much to them.

If an error is made, don't practice elocution when you tell the one at fault about it. To err is human. The transgressor may feel badly enough about it. Make your criticism constructive and helpful.

Encourage promptness by being prompt yourself. Don't delay financing your employees with their week's wages when Saturday night arrives. They feel more like showing up in the morning then. Give each of them an occasional few hours of rest. Flashes of humanity are always well received.

If your manager tells you of a practical way to save money, don't suspect him of stealing someone's else ideas. If his plans are good, don't hesitate to adopt them. If he isn't coming up to the mark, sit down and have it out with him quietly.

See that your ushers, musicians, doorman and box-office girl go to work with a smile on their faces. A smile is a good magnet for silver.

Treat your employees the way you would have the exchange manager treat you, and the results will surprise you. They will transplant that spirit of cordiality to the patrons.

The Manager The manager is the go-between for the owner and the employees. You must supply the fuel of ideas and energy to the machine under your control. Don't nag. Keep your eyes on the persons who buy tickets. If one looks dissatisfied, find out why.

Don't take a baby's cry as a signal to show the mother that you're the manager. Step down the aisle and ask her if there is anything you can do to help her.

Women who attend matinees doubtless spend the morning sweeping and dusting. That's why they hate dirt. So see that the scrub crew doesn't skimp its work with mop, broom and cloth. A dusty chair arm may cost the theatre dear in criticisms.

Don't forget that some persons would rather find fault than praise. But they never become angry because they have no opportunity to do the former.

The manager should be the employer's alter ego. Stay there by being the best fellow on earth, keeping those under you in good humor, giving advice to them when needed, offering helpful criticism, and remembering always that their salaries, yours and the owner's income depend upon the persons who buy the tickets. Guide the work and actions of those under you to always give the greatest satisfaction to the patrons.

The Ticket Seller The ticket seller is the thermometer for the theatre. Your smile through the ticket window spells cheerfulness and amusement within the theatre for the folks with the dimes.

Because you know better, don't turn up your nose at persons who ask foolish questions. A short answer is money turned away. A well-voiced, civil and enlightening reply to the most foolish of questions is just so much more money in the pocket of the man who pays your salary.

If you're a girl, don't support the paint department of a drug store Paint, or overpowdering, is objectionable to many women patrons.

If you're a man, practice economy. The best economy on earth is a clean collar, neatly arranged necktie, a freshly shaven face, and clean cuffs, when viewed from the outside. Women patrons are critical. Keep the window glass in the ticket office clean. Some persons have weak eyes, and might think no one was there.

Don't fuss when you have to extract ten cents from a "twenty," with a long waiting line. Think of the wealthy class of patrons the house is pulling, and be glad that some one is lucky enough to have that much.

Keep a little woolen cloth handy to wipe the finger marks from off the glass over which you slide the tickets. Some persons are sticklers for sanitation, and might think that you were taking Bertillion measurements.

A pleasant smile of welcome is the cheapest and yet the rarest thing on earth. Some will come to your theatre to get rid of a grouch. Your smile will start them right before they get inside the door.

Above all, don't forget you are being paid for working. The best way to get a raise is to help the owner. Just remember that every patron you win to the house is a friend. A first-timer, made to feel at home, coming once a week for a year, is $5.20 more in the box-office.

The Doorman The doorman is the owner's host. Don't think that because a person's dime is already in the box-office, that the whole matter ends right there. It's just the beginning.

Don't take tickets handed you as though you were being bored. Look as though you were honestly glad to see the people. A "thank you" in exchange for every ticket is the best kind of a trading stamp.

If you've a crowd waiting to get in, don't stand inside the door where it's warm. The people that spend their money to see the show are entitled to that room, if there is any.

Keep your uniform pressed. Don't let women with babies wait outside. Find room for them somewhere. You are just as much responsible for the greeting and making welcome of patrons as anyone else.

The Usher The usher is the guardian angel for every patron who enters the theatre.

Don't seat patrons to suit yourself. Some prefer the rear of the house. A couple, unmarried, usually like to sit in one of the side rows. Help them find seats there, and not near any exit lights.

Spend fifty cents for a bull's-eye light. You can flash it down the aisle.

"Yes, sir," and "No, sir," take no more breath than "Yep" and "Nope."

Try walking lightly down the aisles for a change. The carpet will wear longer, and those slightly deaf will applaud louder when the orchestra finishes a selection.

The Musicians No person ever died to the tune of a tango. Neither has anyone ever committed a murder under the spell of "When that Midnight Choo Choo Leaves for Alabam'."

A loosened string on the violin, an untightened drum head, or a flat key on a piano will make everyone laugh Five minutes devoted to inspection before the day's show opens is a good investment.

Some persons appreciate good music. It's a profitable stunt to try and merit their appreciation. Don't gaze at the ceiling when you reach a "rest."

"Time" is essential to the right kind of music, but be sure that you get the right kind of music at the right time.

The Operator A strong light, a steady picture, and no breaks never received criticism from any audience.

There are plenty of good books on projection. They are published to be read.

Every trouble has a remedy. Find it.

Slides are not made to give you an excuse to loaf between reels. Don't insert slides upside down.

Your lungs are just plain lungs. Ten or twelve hours in a hot booth doesn't do them any good. Get an electric fan. You can work better, and won't tire as easily. Show this to the owner.

Getting back to the slide. It covers a multitude of sins and mishaps in the booth, but don't overwork it. People don't go to theatres to learn that "Ufty's Bread Is Best."

I saw one operator change reels in eleven seconds. His employer has him under contract at $30 a week. He started at $12. But he told the owner what he thought could be done to improve business, and he thought about business outside the booth as well as in.

No machine ever worked without cleaning and oiling. The machine is your stock in trade.

To All You're all there for a purpose. To work for the owner, please the patrons, put on the show, and make it pay. Do it!

CUSTOMS MEN MAY CENSOR FOREIGN PICTURES

Motion pictures soon may be shown in a specially constructed theatre in the New York Custom House, and grim-faced censors will pass on them. The government wants to guard public morals.

Such a scheme is under consideration at the Treasury Department because of the requirements of the new tariff law for a censorship of imported films. When the foreign pictures are too bad they will go back.

THE FEATURE FILM OF TO-MORROW

taken its place, and the vaudeville theatre is the home of women and children.

This is just what must come about in the motion picture theatre. One of the best ways to improve motion pictures lies through the industrial and educational film. It is not necessary to make an industrial picture dry and uninteresting. "Back to the Old Farm" contains all the interest that is found in the average film, and yet running through it is an educational theme of value. When moving picture people cease to put entertainment in one bag and education in another, but mix the two together, shake well and serve, then the theatres will have enough entertainment and enough education to not only hold those who prefer entertainment, but to secure the endorsement of those who are looking for education.

When this is done, such organizations as the National Legal Regulation League will cease to exist. It is certainly worth a great deal more to the motion picture business to have the teachers, judges, and leaders in our city life endorsing and working for the picture theatre than to have them working against it.

The field for the industrial story picture is unlimited, and I believe that the day is not far off when some live producer will seize this field and make the most of it.

EXPOSING SPIRITUALISTS

It was suggested in these pages a few weeks ago that the motion picture might be made to assist in exposing the tricks of the so-called spiritualists. The suggestion was made in the hope that possibly our implied challenge might have been taken up by our stereoscopic friends. This has not happened. We are glad to perceive that across the Atlantic a motion picture has been shown exposing the tricks by means of which spiritualists can deceive their victims—or rather have deceived them.

Some close up views were taken in the course of a dramatic subject and the whole bag of tricks laid bare.

INTERESTING FILM REVIEWS

Educational—Industrial—Scenic—General

THE DANGLING NOOSE." Selig. Oct. 31.)—Until the last moment the audience is led to believe Bill an awful scoundrel, but he is not a villain, he's a hero. Watkins, his prospective father-in-law, needs some money to secure an option on some property. Not having it, his servant steals it and is arrested and just saved from a hanging. Bill wants to get that option, but until the last few feet his purpose is misunderstood. He wanted it to give to Watkins as a present.

"The Toll of the Marshes." Essanay. Two Reels. (Oct. 31.)—Francis X. Bushman and Helen Dunbar both interpret their parts very well. The story tells of the old "gold brick" game of selling worthless land. In this case a young man and his mother buy some of this land and cannot make a living. The swindler loses his child in the marsh and their finding her regains for them their lost footing with interest. It is well staged.

"Peggy's Burglar." Vitagraph. (Oct. 31.)—A comedy in a girls' boarding school, with Edith Storey, Norma Talmadge and Harry Lambert. Edith Storey, while stealing olives arouses the matron, who calls the police. When they get on the scene there is a real burglar, who is captured by Edith in her attempt to dodge the police. Some amusement with a laundry slide is introduced.

"Fatty's Affair of Honor." Vitagraph. (Oct. 31.)—A split-reel with "Peggy's Burglar." Hughey Mack, of course, plays Fatty and makes much of a poor part. He loves a girl, who is attracted to a "Count," and a duel is arranged. When the guns are fired they are both hit with "cowardly" eggs.

"In Love and War." Pathe Freres (Oct. 30.)—One of the French pictures. The sub-titles are not clearly photographed. An officer in the army loves a peasant girl too well before he is called away to the war in North Africa. In the scene in the lodge one can feel the passion of the lovers. On his return from the war he has forgotten the girl and is about to marry her mistress, not knowing her proximity, when the truth becomes known and the brides are changed.

"A Momentous Decision." Lubin (Oct. 31.)—When a man has to decide whether he will save his employer's wife or his employer's fortune he has to do some very swift thinking. That is the position Jimmy found himself in, and he decided on the former and saved the girl, who was about to elope with a business associate of Mr. Phillips. It took some tough thinking, though.

"A Japanese Wedding." Melies. (Oct. 30.)—On the reel with "Japanese Shoe-Maker." The ceremony is most interesting and novel because of its non-resemblance to the Christian form. The principal part seems to be the tea drinking and exchanging of presents. The complete ceremony is gone through before the camera, and is a little monotonous.

"The Fruits of Vengeance." Vitagraph General Film Co., Exclusive Service. (Oct. 31.)—Shakespeare once wrote, "'Tis a monster begot upon itself, born on itself," in writing of jealousy. This is the foundation of this drama. Julia Gordon plays the lead and is supported by Helen Costello and Courtenay Foote. Harry Morey, as the bewhiskered "heavy," is very good. The scenes are mostly laid in a circus tent. Owen, a tight-rope walker, calls on Mrs. Lynch, a former bareback rider. Lynch gets into a frenzy in his jealousy and tries to strike her, thus forcing her to take to the circus again. By a diabolical scheme Lynch tries to kill Owen, but seeing that his child will also be killed, he tries to prevent the catastrophe at the last moment, and is killed himself the others being saved.

"She Should Worry." Lubin General Film Exclusive Service. (Oct. 31.)—A fair comedy of the seashore, with some good bathing costumes introduced. A flirt goes after every girl with nice-looking lower extremities and he is cured of this by "the bunch." False legs and "the water cure" play a big part in the education of the "pest."

"Paying the Bill." Lubin General Film Co., Exclusive Service. (Oct. 31.)—Joe, one of those "wild Westerners" of fiction, is in debt. He decides he will have to kill the collector who keeps worrying him with letters. So he goes East and meets a stranger.

KLEINE-ECLIPSE AIRSHIP BLOWS UP IN MID-AIR

Surely "Eclipse" has "eclipsed" itself in matter of pictures where the absolute dare-deviltry of the actor provides a thrill for the picture fan. This illustration shows the smashup of a Bleriot machine, which, with Joe Hamman and his wife, is plainly seen to blow up in a great burst of smoke and flame and drop to the earth in full view of the camera. This scene is from a thrilling Kleine-Eclipse entitled: "Airship versus Aeroplane," for which the release date has not yet been set.

They have a great time together until Joe finds out he is the collector. And then the fun starts. Joe pays, however.

"The Curse." Domino. Two Reels. —A smack of Hawthorne's "Scarlet Letter" may be seen in this film. Faith loves the stranger who has visited the Salem Colony, and gives up her former lover. Whereupon the latter accuses her of witchcraft and by circumstantial evidence this accusation seems to be verified. She is about to be burned when the new Governor saves her by producing the edict of the King condemning burning for witchcraft.

"Zuza, the Band Leader." Keystone. Two Reels.—The best comedy that the Keystone Company has put out in a long time. Ford Sterling, the unequaled comedian (of his class) plays the lead and is supported by Mabel Normand. Both have exceptional opportunities for distinguishing themselves and take advantage of them. The band leader, composer of "The Chicken's Dream," is much beloved by all the ladies, to such an extent that it becomes monotonous. Mabel's lover causes all the excitement by trying to kill the leader. There are the usual chases, with action every moment.

"The War Correspondent." Broncho. Two Reels.—A good drama, full of action and with good settings. Dealing with a war correspondent in the Civil War and how he beats all his rivals with the story of the battle of Gettysburg and secures a scoop, though penned in jail with the others. A pretty love story is also introduced. This should not be confused with the Itala four-part subject, "The War Correspondent," nor should it be underestimated because of the difference in length.

"Janet of the Dunes." Edison. Two Reels. (Oct. 31.)—One of the prettiest stories that has been produced, and should be pleasing audiences for years to come. Mabel Trunelle as Mary Fleming and Janet is given an excellent opportunity and makes the most of it. Herbert Prior is also very good as Devant. He falls in love with a country girl, but soon tires of her after marriage, and finally deserts her. She goes back to her home with her little daughter Janet, but dies the next day, leaving the child in the care of Captain Billy, her former courtier. Billy cares for the baby as though it were his own. She is fond of studying, and gets into one of the summer homes to read until one day she is surprised there by the owner, Devant. He discovers she is his daughter and welcomes her and her lover, Dick, an artist. The settings and photography in many places absolutely defy description.

"Old Doc Yak and the Artist's Dream." Selig. (Oct. 30.)—A series of pictures drawn by Sidney Smith, of the Chicago Tribune, representing his creation of the "man-goat." The artist, while hunting inspiration, falls asleep and dreams of his pet picture, which goes through various pranks.

"Japanese Shoe-Maker." Melies (Oct. 30.)—The Japanese do not wear leather shoes, nor do they wear the proverbial sandal of the Far East. They wear a wooden shoe, without uppers, the sole not resting on the ground, however. Two wooden supports about an inch in height serve as soles. A pair of these may be made in ten minutes and they are most comfortable. An interesting film.

"The Rattlesnake." Lubin. Two Reels. (Oct. 30.)—A part of this story might have originated in the brain of Edgar Allen Poe. That part is really gruesome, and causes a delicious shiver up and down the spine. This refers to the part where the large rattlesnake is first handled by Romaine Fielding. His work is better than he has done in some time. The story is one of love and vengeance in Mexico. Happy Tony loves a girl, but she jilts him because of his fondness for this snake that has saved his life. She marries an American surveyor, and Tony, no longer "happy," plans revenge, but the sight of the little child of his former fiancée changes his mind. Mortiz Cytron as Jose is very clever indeed.

The Rajah's Diamond Rose. Eclipse-Kleine. Two Reels. (Oct. 28.)—Blackmail is the actuating motif of this picture, which deals with a bogus count, who, by showing his paste "diamond" rose to young men of good family, causes them to steal it. Through a clever arrangement he so works it that the amateur thieves are not only caught but photographed. In this manner he collects much "blood money." A pretty romance runs through the story.

Making Good. Lubin. (Oct. 28.)—A comedy. The boaster is given the "open door" by the girls and the timid fellow lionized.

Giving Bill a Rest. Lubin. (Oct. 28.)—On the same reel with "Making Good." A henpecked husband is made to cater to his wife's every wish until he resorts to flirtation and wins part freedom. With appropriate music this should go well.

The Spinners of Speech. Pathé. (Oct. 28.)—The telephone has ever been a subject of mystery to the uninitiated, and even to those in everyday touch with it. In making the various systems clear the Pathé Company have accomplished much good.

The picture first deals with work on the Pacific Coast and in the Rockies, showing the planting of poles over the mountain, the stretching of the single wires, which later become conduits, and thus reach the central offices. The myriads of wires at the back of switchboards, with insulating methods, is clearly shown. Finally a miner talking to the mine owner in New York from Denver, Col., is shown, and how the connections are made. In speaking this distance the two men use $1,000,000 worth of equipment.

Those seeing this picture will appreciate the telephone service more.

Father's Hat-Band. Vitagraph. (Oct. 29.)—A roaring good comedy, with Norma Talmadge, Leo Delaney and Flora Finch. Doris loves a clerk in her father's office. Not being able to write to each other through the mails they evolve a good plan. When father goes home a letter is placed in his hatband and the answer is returned the same way. All goes well until the father exchanges hats in a barber shop, and a henpecked husband gets accused of trying to elope. It all works out well enough, and puts the audience in a good humor.

Cupid and Three. Essanay. (Oct. 29.)—A fair comedy, with Billy Mason in the stellar rôle. Jack and Ben both love the same girl, Celia. She prefers the latter. Jack by dressing as a girl and going out with Ben excites the jealousy of Celia so much that he nearly gets her promise to marry him, when the truth is made public.

The Horrible Example. Edison. (Oct. 29.)—A satire on the old-fashioned prohibitionist. It is not, however, at all offensive, rather it is productive of much mirth. A traveling salesman loves the daughter of a rabid prohibitionist, but Mr. Dryun objects, because Harold sells corks, and corks are used by the liquor interests. Harold wins out, however, by becoming the "Horrible Example," and fills the squeakers' bottle of cough medicine with something stronger, making his prospective fatherin-law most benevolent, in which mood he is joined by sundry others.

The Trail of the Lost Chord. American. (Nov. 17.)—After the beautiful poem by Adelaide A. Proctor, the action, however, does not follow the story in the poem, but is merely symbolical of it. The original verse is purely the thoughts of the mind, the action, therefore, being abstract and impossible of interpretation. Josef, having married a girl, is happy until the start of their honeymoon, when she is killed. He becomes a monk. The idea brought forward, as well as it can be understood, is th ' the lost "chord" represents lost girl.

Wine. Keystone.—The first part of this picture is very good. The process the grapes pass through from the time they leave the field until they become wine is shown clearly. A 4,000-acre farm is chosen for the pictures, and interesting figures are given to show the amount of wine produced.

A Modern Steel Plant. American. —A panorama of a large steel mill is first pictured, followed by various interiors, and ending up with the process of melting iron and pouring it from the conveyors and then lifting it with large magnets.

The Shadow of Nazareth. Warner's Features. Three Parts.—The biblical story of the treachery of Judas Iscariot, with the addition of a little imagination in order to make a good story. The story is treated with due reverence and is capably handled. Judas Iscariot is persuaded to betray his Master, Jesus Christ, by his sister Judith, who later becomes insane and kills herself. Judas, after having bestowed the traitor's kiss, also commits suicide.

The mob scenes, especially when the crowd surge around the Lord on trial before Pontius Pilate, are very well directed. Constance Crawley and Arthur Maude, the English stars, are featured.

In the Toils of an Adventuress. Savoia-Warner's Features.—An unscrupulous man, in order to gain some valuable documents, hires an adventuress to obtain them for him in any manner. The girl succeeds in getting into the old man's confidence and, having drugged him, steals the papers. The man's son is the inventor of a wonderful machine which photographs things at a distance and out of normal sight. He sees the dastardly act and recovers the papers after a fight, for which he is rewarded by his father.

The Doom of the Ocean. Eclectic. Three Parts.—A melodrama, somewhat on the style of "Shore Acres." The films have been colored, the shades being a little incongruous in places. The story deals with the attempt of a villain to prevent a girl collecting a fortune due her under her uncle's will by delaying her beyond the final time set. A lighthouse plays a prominent part.

The Barrier of Blood. Ammex-Exclusive. Two Reels.—An exciting story full of heart interest. A young half-breed loves a girl, but cannot marry her because of his doubtful blood. On learning that he is a half-breed he makes the girl so hate him that she leaves his life forever. Good photography prevails.

James Lee's Wife. Rex.—After the poem by Robert Browning, the sub-titles being in verse. Lois Weber plays with her husband, Phillips Smalley. The finale is an artistic masterpiece of photography.

A Daughter of the Wilderness. Edison. (Oct. 28.)—A powerful story of the Canadian woods, with just sufficient melodrama to please. Augustus Phillips and Mary Fuller play the leads. The story deals with an obedient daughter who loves a stranger, but who is forced to accept the attentions of a woodsman through fear of her father. All turns out well through the help of a fearless priest, who has been called to marry the father's choice to Annette, but who replaces the groom with Annette's choice, Gerald.

Thy Will Be Done. Essanay. (Oct. 28.) — A pathetic children's story, which will also fascinate the "grown-ups." A little girl, having lost her mother, writes to her in heaven, and although she naturally does not get her own relation back, she wins a happy home with the postmaster.

Motion Picture Dancing Lessons. Kalem. Three Parts. (Oct. 29.)—There is a possibility that young people loving dancing will agree to sit through the whole three reels of this picture. The various forms of the turkey-trot, the tango and Vienese hesitation waltz are all shown with attention to the small details. The picture serves as a screen dancing academy, with Joan Sawyer and Wallace McCutcheon, well-known dancers and instructors, as tutors. Close views, showing the feet only, are instructive.

His Wife's Child. Victor. Two Reels.—With Florence Lawrence, supported by Earle Foxe and P. D. Standing, a picture is nearly assured of perfect action. A girl, married unhappily, runs away with another man who is a drunkard. He finally kills her, and their child (Florence Lawrence), after a series of adventures, meets her mother's husband and they become friends, though he knows the truth. A detail that would have added to the picture would have been the reintroduction of Flo's playmate, who went away with the stranger to become rich, after she had become "rich."

The White Squaw. Bison. Two Reels.—A good Western. A girl is saved in an Indian massacre by a squaw and is brought up as a member of the tribe. She loves Clifford, a cavalry officer, and he reciprocates. Her identity is made known finally by the faithful squaw who had watched her. Several good fights are staged.

The Bride of Mystery. Bison. Three Reels. Grace Cunard has in this picture proven herself to be, not only a capable actress, but a good play writer. The story deals with two murders and a number of robberies, in all of which the only clue is a monogrammed cigarette. The detective cannot find out who it is. Finally it is discovered the "Countess X," an actress, is the mesmeric subject of a brute, who makes her do these acts while under his hypnotic influence. The fight at the end in the flooded cellar was well staged and directed.

Pathe's Weekly No. 64. (Nov. 3.)—In this issue, as in No. 62, there is but one item from another country. The Portola festival in San Francisco, with the crowning of the queen, is very pretty. A large mountain fire in California follows this, showing the methods used by the volunteer fire departments. The rededication of Congress Hall in Philadelphia has a historic interest. Dawson, N. M., is the scene of a large explosion which entombs 223 miners 4,000 feet from human aid. The marriage of Prince Arthur of Connaught and the Duchess of Fife, and the attempt of the suffragettes to approach the carriage, is the only foreign item. Strike of the mail chauffeurs in New York and the wreck of the "Glenesslin" on the Oregon Coast complete the film.

THIRD "FANTOMAS" MYSTERY

"Fantomas, the Mysterious Finger-Print," a Gaumont four-part production, is the third of a series of mysterious detective tales.

This picture starts out with the death of a young lady of noble blood in the house of Dollon, who is accused of the crime. He is thrown in jail, but later disappears when the prison doctor has pronounced him a suicide. Fandor, the detective, is following the trail as a newspaper man. "Softy," a supposed lunatic, is also on the trail. From one thing to another the plot leads, through a series of fascinating excitement, finally closing with the attempted arrest of Lafayette, the banker, alias Fantomas the Rogue. He, however, escapes, and the police are baffled. A wonderfully interesting story that will hold the audience spellbound.

The M & F Feature Film Service, of Chicago, has been sold to Messrs. Spencer and Herschberg, of the General Special Feature Film Company. David Mundstock, the former owner, is now on a vacation, which will include a trip to the Pacific Coast. He may return to Chicago later to enter another line of the film business. The M & F Feature Film Service was an established and prosperous concern which has handled many features in Illinois and Wisconsin.

UNIVERSAL CHANGES

With an eye to strengthening the Pacific Coast companies, the Universal Film Manufacturing Company has made several changes and realignments of its playing and directing forces [illegible] Hollywood, Cal., studios.

Edna Maison, who has been playing leads in the Powers company, has been advanced to the lead in the Rex, playing opposite Bob Leonard and under the direction of Otis Turner.

Allan Dwan has returned to the Universal fold, bringing with him Pauline Bush, M. J. MacQuarrie and other members of his company. He will assemble an extra company for large productions. James Neil will be attached to this company as leading man. The latter's position as director with the Joker branch will be filled by Allan Curtis.

Donald McDonald, who has been leading man with Nestor under A. E. Christie, will direct with Powers. In his company will be found Howard Hickman, Laura Oakley, Marie Walcamp, and Dick Rosson. Mr. Macdonald will be succeeded as leading man of the Nestor company by John A. Sterling, who has been playing comedy rôles for the past two years with the Essanay company.

Superstition causes great annoyance and confusion at Gaumont's offices at the World's Tower Building, New York City. Some months ago the floors were numbered from one to twenty-nine. Number thirteen were in great fear and panic—so petitioned a change of number. Now every floor above twelve has been changed. Thirteen is no longer thirteen, but fourteen.

PICTURING VICE IN MOTION PICTURES

[The views expressed in the subjoined editorial from the New York Times closely conform to those expressed in The Motion Picture News on the subject of the representation of vice in motion pictures.—Ed. Motion Picture News.]

It is a decision of very grave import, if it has been made finally, to put before the promiscuous audiences of the motion picture theatres of the United States and of foreign countries plays "depicting vividly the inner workings of the vice interests in New York City." The pictures are to be based upon the recently published Rockefeller vice report, which is meant to be circulated discreetly among persons who may be influential in checking or doing away with the evils it discloses. It was never meant for indiscriminate circulation, least of all in pictorial form before audiences composed of both sexes and all ages, but chiefly the young.

This is strong meat for children. The business of producing motion pictures has effected a revolution in the world's amusement. It has enormous educative possibilities, not as well developed now as they were before the crude farces and melodramas, many of them maudlin in their sentimentality, almost usurped the places of films depicting foreign scenes and strange plants and animals and their habits. With the sinister announcement of the syndicating of vicious scenes it is reported that one of the leading theatres of this city will soon be given over to motion pictures and to elaborate advertisements of films and dramatic productions.

Their audiences are not picked audiences. Scenes produced with a view to enlightenment upon disagreeable subjects may be advisable in carefully selected circumstances and before persons who know what they have been summoned to see. Producing them promiscuously will almost inevitably have a distorting and banal effect, and, more than conceivably, will pour oil upon the flames of vice. The promoters of this enterprise are incurring, it seems to us, a fearful responsibility. No phase of the life it proposes to depict "shall appear in the leastwise attractive," the announcement runs. Pitch is not attractive, but it will stick and burn.

OLD SHIP FOR PICTURES

The New York Motion Picture Corporation recently stole a march on its competitors on the Pacific Coast by outbidding them and purchasing the three-masted sailing vessel, the Fremont, for $12,000.

The Fremont was built in Philadelphia in 1850, and has visited almost every corner of the earth. In 1861 she was pressed into service on the Union side and served in almost every capacity. After the war the vessel rounded the Horn to San Francisco, where she has been ever since.

Some months ago, when the spectacular possibilities of sea pictures were realized, the firms producing motion pictures on the Pacific Coast turned to maritime subjects. Every ship and hull on the coast increased in value at once. The Fremont is 155 feet long, with a twenty-six-foot beam. In addition to being used in pictures, she will become the flag-ship of the admiral, Thomas H. Ince, of the New York Motion Picture Corporation's fleet, which now numbers five vessels.

KINETO FILMS GO FAST

J. Wild, sales manager of the American Kineto Company, announces the following States as being closed for their present releases:

FILMS TO ADVERTISE SHOWS

Marcus Loew, the vaudeville magnate, who owns and controls many theatres in the East, and who has just entered the field as a producer of big musical shows as a partner of Lew Fields with "The Pleasure Seekers," which is now playing at the Winter Garden, is also preparing to use motion picture films for advertising purposes in a way in which they have never been used before.

If "The Pleasure Seekers" proves to be a success, or if it is good enough to be sent on tour, motion pictures of the piece in its various stages will be shown in all of the Loew theatres.

Films have already been made of the rehearsals of the musical comedy and of scenes at railroad stations while the piece was on its short preliminary tour, and these are being displayed in the twenty or more theatres controlled by Loew in Greater New York, together with announcements that the original itself can be seen at the Winter Garden.

If the show is sent "on the road" the films will go in advance and take the place of much of the billboard advertising.

BACK WITH ALASKAN FILMS

Albert E. Cawood is back in New York after traveling twenty-two thousand miles through the Arctic regions making motion pictures for the General Film Producing Company, of New York.

Mr. Cawood left July 5th and went direct to Seattle and Juneau, Alaska, and then followed the most perilous trails through the heart of Alaska, over snow-clad mountains and frozen trails, until he finally reached Nome. After leaving Nome he proceeded to the Seal Islands, only to hear the city of Nome had been destroyed by fire and flood the day after he had left there. He returned there immediately, and after securing what pictures he could, followed the coast line down to Sitka and then back to New York.

Before leaving on his perilous trip he was escorted part of the way to Skagway by Governor Stone, of Alaska, and a party of prominent citizens, and after reaching Nome the services of the United States revenue cutter were offered to him, which assisted him greatly.

MATELDI IS CINES ACTOR—NOT MATADOR

Much comment has been passed concerning the past history of Goffredo Mateldi, who plays the "lead" in the Kleine-Cines release, "For Love of a Toreador," scheduled for release Tuesday, November 18. Newspaper men and others have asked how Mateldi, who plays the lead in several other Kleine-Cines pictures, could maneuver a bull into a twenty-foot camera line and keep him there at the big bull-ring in Seville.

Information from the Cines studios since then shows that Director Guazzoni, of the Cines Company, engaged Mateldi several days prior to the bull-fight, and after Mateldi had been engaged as a matador at that contest. Mateldi, therefore, is an ex-toreador by trade. Guazzoni used the toreador in the picture and cleverly insinuated the thread of his story into the scenes made at the bull-ring.

EXHIBITORS' FILM PRODUCTION COMPANY FOR DAYTON

A new film company which is to have its headquarters and studios in Dayton is being formed by prominent business men and motion picture theatre owners in the Middle West.

The plan contemplates a service of twenty-one reels a week, a two-reel feature and a single-reel play each day. Exhibitors who are associated with the company will have exclusive rights to the service in their respective localities. High-class pictures are to be made.

The services of some of the most famous actors in the country will be secured in making the plays. The company will be known as the Exhibitors' Film Production Company.

DETROIT EXHIBITORS DINE AND ELECT OFFICERS

The members of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Detroit held their first banquet recently at the Hotel Ponchartrain. The toastmaster was National Vice-President Peter J. Jeupe. The speakers were M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America; Mr. Brocklet and Mr. Seaman, of the General Film Company; Mr. Mailbridge, of the Universal; Mr. Dubuck, of the Mutual, and Mr. Lynch and Mr. Levy.

The following officers were elected: President, W. B. Gandy; first vice-president, J. R. Smith; second vice-president, F. J. Zanone; secretary, G. O. Dupuis; treasurer, M. Osborn, and sergeant-at-arms, H. B. Hoffman.

Application was made for a charter for the Lima local. This organization will hold its second meeting very soon.

IMP EUROPEAN COMPANY BACK

The Imp European Company, which has been producing pictures in England and on the Continent for several months, has returned. The members include Herbert Brenon, director; Leah Baird, leading woman; William Shay, leading man; George Edward Hall, scenario expert; Julius Stern, business manager, and M. Barlieter, a famous French oarsman.

They were met at the dock by Carl Laemmle, president of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company; Mark Dintenfass, manager of several Universal studios; Walter MacNamara, the director, and several other Universalites.

The company started out with King Baggot as leading man. When he was with them "Ivanhoe," "Absinthe," "The Child Stealers of Paris" and "Mr. and Mrs. Innocence Abroad" were produced. Mr. Baggot was recalled to head and direct his own company here, and was replaced by Mr. Shay. "Time Is Money," "Love and a Lottery Ticket," "Love or a Throne" and "Across the Atlantic" were produced with Mr. Shay as leading man. The pictures were made in England, France and Germany. "Ivanhoe" has already been released and has proved very successful.

When the company reached shore William Robert Daly presented Mr. Stern with a pair of diamond-studded cuff links, the gift of the employees at the Imp studio.

Mr. Brenon and his company will produce pictures again at the Imp studio, where Mr. Stern has already resumed his position as manager. Mr. MacNamara will take his company to the Coytesville studios, where Mr Dintenfass will be manager. Other companies will also work at Coytesville.

KLEINE'S "POMPEII" A SENSATION IN PICTURE HOUSES

Since the announcement that George Kleine will rent or share "The Last Days of Pompeii" for picture houses, hundreds of theatre men have been quick to seize the advantage of a Kleine-made production, with the result that the famous picture is cramming houses all over the country. As the terms are attractive, and the subject magnificent and spectacular, bookings are being made rapidly.

Mayor Lew Shank, of Indianapolis, has arranged for a lecture tour, and moving pictures are now being made by the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company to carry out the points of his arguments. The great topic of the day, "The Cost of High Living" and "The Cost of Living High" will be covered thoroughly by the Mayor.

To Open Dayton Convention Publicity Bureau

M. A. NEFF, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, arrived in Dayton Monday, November 3rd. State vice-president, Mr. O. D. Weaver, of the Lyceum Theatre, was waiting with his automobile. They immediately drove out to the National Cash Register Company, where quite a lengthy consultation was held with the officers of the National Cash Register Company. After going into details of the coming National Convention, which will open in Dayton on Tuesday, July 7, 1914, it was decided to open a publicity and exposition office in a very few days.

An effort will be made to bring exhibitors from every part of the world and through the channels of commerce that are now already established with foreign countries the Dayton convention no doubt will be a real international exposition, with exhibits from all parts of the world.

One film of Dayton will be made, and also one film that was taken before and during the flood will be used, giving different views of the important points; of the big hall which seats 6,000 people, where the convention and exposition of arts will be held; of Dayton before and during the flood, showing the rapid progress in restoring Dayton to its former beauty and prestige. The National Cash Register Company will give its efficient and enthusiastic support to the convention.

After the conference was over Mr. Neff and Mr. Weaver drove to the Odd Fellows' Building, where a Dutch lunch was served to the Dayton Local and several visiting members. Harmony and good-fellowship prevailed, and everybody was enthusiastic over the coming convention.

After the lunch a committee drove Mr. Neff up to the convention hall, where it was inspected and plans gone over carefully which will be considered in the future for the entertainment and pleasure of the guests, and especially the exhibits. The convention and the exhibits will be held under one roof.

The convention will be under the direct supervision of the National Executive Committee.

Stage War in Cuba for Pictures

All-Star Company Back from Filming "Soldiers of Fortune"

THE company which has been down in Cuba producing a motion picture version of Richard Harding Davis' famous book and play, "Soldiers of Fortune," for the All-Star Feature Corporation, returned Wednesday.

The roster included Richard Harding Davis; Augustus Thomas, the playwright, who is head producer for All-Star; Director William F. Haddock; Dustin Farnum, leading man; Winnifred Kingston, who played Madame Alvarez; John Pratt, George Cooke, Jr., and Irving Willat and others.

"Soldiers of Fortune" is a war play, with its scenes laid in a tropical republic, and for that reason Cuba was invaded by the Davis-Thomas forces. Several hundred rifles, thousands of rounds of ammunition and enough uniforms to fit out the army of any South or Central American revolutionist also went along, but were not used, as Mr. Davis succeeded in obtaining the right to use the regular soldiers of the Cuban Army, together with a large force of American bluejackets and an American machine gun.

How Davis Wrote the Story

"There was quite a story in our trip," said Mr. Davis at the Hotel Webster on his return. "When I was a young man just out of college, long before I had begun to write anything, I went to Santiago, Cuba, to work for an iron company because I knew the president of the company. I stayed there a couple of years, and all the time the company was in hot water with revolutionists and Spaniards, and occasionally Americans mixed up in the continual scrapping which was going on.

"At last I came back home, and ten years later wrote my first novel, 'Soldiers of Fortune.' Five years later Gus Thomas dramatized it, and now, nearly fifteen years after that, we get together again and do it for the camera. It is to be put on the screen in a Broadway theatre about the first of the year.

"We left New York on October 11, and went at once to Santiago and put the play on. I tell you it was quite a surprise to see real live people walking in and out of real houses and going through the scenes just as I imagined them when I wrote the story.

"You see, you don't get the same sort of feeling at all when you see a story of your own on the stage, where the scenery is all painted and flimsy; but down in Cuba we had the real thing every time, and the big fight scene took place in the plaza of the town, just as I had pictured it, and we had the soldiers defending the gate and the heroine escaping on the locomotive, and everything else that the book called for. In all we took 233 separate scenes, all outlined by Mr. Thomas and directed by him.

Used 2,000 Cuban Regulars

"The Cuban Government was splendid to us, and lent us the army to do anything we wished with. We had 2,000 Cuban regulars fighting before the camera and 25 bluejackets from the American boat Osceola, and in addition the people of the city took a great interest in the work and used to turn out and watch the picture taking and applaud just as though they were seeing a show in a theatre.

"There were no stage doors for the Cuban johnnies to hang around, but they followed us from place to place, and before long we had them working in every scene. Sometimes they were coal passers and at other times they were society men, but they did whatever we wanted them to do, and it was considered quite an honor to be in the picture or to lend your house for a scene.

"The only trouble we had was in getting permission to land the rapid-fire gun. It was a case of landing a firearm on foreign soil, and we had to get permission from the President, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Governor of the Province of Santiago, the Alcalde of the city, and the American Consul, but finally we got it through.

Actress Mistaken for Queen

"They would not consent to allow the Cuban flag to be used, however, nor the real flag of any other country, so we had to get up a special flag. We designed one in green and white with green and pink stars, and they were willing to stand for that.

"The woman who played the rôle of the wife of the President was called upon to do a lot of escaping. Once, when she got away from the villain dressed in a ball gown, I found her sitting in a grove of palm trees fighting off mosquitoes that were almost eating her bare neck and arms off.

"'If I had known I was going to escape like this,' she told me, 'I'd have stuck to the palace and got shot, whether it would have spoiled your old play or not.'

"Another actress was dressed up to represent a very rich Spanish woman, and I doubt if any such creature as she looked like ever lived except in a comic opera. One day when it came time to take a scene with her in it she was missing, and I went out to look for her. I saw an American workman on the road and I said to him, 'Did you see an American woman pass this way?'

"'No,' replied the man, 'but I just saw the Queen of Spain go by.'"

OPENING FOR INDUSTRIALS IN INDIA

UNDER the heading "Cinematograph Advertising in India," Consul Henry D. Baker has the following to say on special commercial service in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports:

"While visiting the Central Library Department of the government of the native state of Baroda, in Western India, I was apprised of an interesting scheme carried on by this department for giving cinematograph shows throughout Baroda for industrial and agricultural education of the people.

"I asked the manager of this department if it would be agreeable to receive from the United States industrial films, which, while advertising various American agricultural appliances, machinery and other articles, would likewise, perhaps, be of much educational benefit to people in Baroda who had never had opportunity of seeing such articles in actual use. He replied that industrial films contributed by manufacturing firms of the United States for the visual instruction branch of the Central Library of Baroda would be heartily welcomed and displayed throughout the state. He later sent me a memorandum on the subject as follows:

"'The cinematograph used by our visual instruction branch takes films of the standard size, a sample of which is inclosed. We shall be glad to receive the films and exhibit them through the state. The films thus supplied will prove a very good free advertisement because the people here are particularly interested in foreign industrial films.'

"A specimen of the standard film thus mentioned is forwarded for the information of American firms interested, and will be loaned on application to the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Washington, D. C.

"The object of the visual instruction work to be carried on by the Baroda Central Library Department was explained as follows in the Library Miscellany for November, 1912, a periodical published by this department:

"'The department is determined to make fresh efforts day by day to make itself more useful to the public, and especially to that large portion of the public who have either no taste for reading or cannot read. For this purpose the Central Library has recently purchased for its traveling library branch a number of stereoscopes and stereoscopic sets of travel tours. These stereographs are arranged systematically in tours of countries and sections, and are accompanied by simple locating maps and authoritative explanatory books. The realistic mode of sightseeing is enjoyed by the least studious as well as the most highly educated readers, and is a very effective means of diverting from light reading to more serious reading of books of travel, biography, and history.

"'The library has also been giving for some time past cinematographic shows to the college and high-school students in the Baroda City, but it has quite lately extended its operations to a few towns and villages of the Baroda district. The Maharaja has kindly lent his private cinematograph machine for this purpose to the library, which he is soon going to transfer completely, with all the slides and films. The country folk seem to have thoroughly enjoyed these shows, and the Maharaja is contemplating the opening of a visual instruction branch of the Central Library. (Subsequently, in January, 1913, a grant of $3,500 for a year was sanctioned by his highness.)'

"The important possibilities connected with illustrative advertising in India by means of cinematograph shows is beginning to be taken advantage of by a few European firms which, by very moderate expenditures of money, have arranged with many cinematograph enterprises in this country for the inclusion of their industrial films on the program of the evening's regular entertainment. A small charge is made in such cases for using these films, usually not exceeding $15 per month, or sometimes in lieu of such charge the firms desiring its films exhibited publishes at its own expense the theatre programs, including, of course, its own advertisements on such programs.

"As an instance of such advertising in India through the cinematograph, one leading European firm promotes the sale of condensed milk in this market by exhibiting pictures showing the insanitary conditions in milking cows in this country; also the frequent adulteration of milk with water taken from tainted sources of supply, and then in contrast its own sanitary method of milking cows and condensing the milk by modern apparatus insuring purity. Another firm promoting the sale of French wines shows pictures of its vineyards and the interesting method of making the wine.

FAMOUS PLAYERS SECURES "LEAH KLESCHNA"

The Famous Players has secured the rights to the famous stage success, "Leah Kleschna," in which will be presented the celebrated actress, Carlotta Nillson. No other production of the Famous Players, with the possible exceptions of "Tess of the D'Urbervilles" and "The Count of Monte Cristo," has won such distinction on the stage. It has been one of Mrs. Fiske's greatest dramatic triumphs.

"Leah Kleschna" brings to the motion picture a new prestige, and numerous opportunities for great camera effects. Like "The Prisoner of Zenda," "Tess" and "The Count of Monte Cristo," the film production bids fair to surpass the original, because of the greater limitations of the oral stage for scenic and realistic effects.

As is commonly known, the stagecraft and technique of the spoken drama are amazingly inferior to the powers of the camera. In the film version the scenes on the burning vessel and many other thrilling effects on the sea and in the general outdoors can be realistically portrayed, whereas in the drama they can only be described verbally.

Carlotta Nillson's association with the motion picture will also confer upon Filmdom a new dignity, comparable to the glories of Mrs. Fiske, Lillie Langtry, James O'Neill, James K. Hackett, Henry E. Dixey and other stars. The production is scheduled for release on December 10.

ALBUQUERQUE FILM COMPANY FORMED

Incorporated at $50,000, with $20,000 paid in, the Albuquerque Film Manufacturing Company has been formed with Albuquerque men and G. P. Hamilton, late of the St. Louis Motion Picture Company, as incorporators.

Mr. Hamilton is president and general manager; W. E. Rogers is secretary and treasurer. The other incorporators are Henry F. Connelly, vice-president; C. O. Cushman, J. H. Mahboub, H. P. Wanner and W. R. Walton.

Mr. Hamilton is after a franchise with Warner Features. Single reel comedy productions will likely be handled by the Universal. Local made features will also be shown at this house.

Several of the old St. Louis company's aggregation will be with the new company. One of these is Buck Connors. The new concern will begin production in about four weeks.

The brands under which the films will be produced have not yet been selected, but will include the name "Albuquerque."

Ruby Features Present Governor Sulzer

IT was a notorious fact during the turmoil at Albany which attended the proceedings by which Governor Sulzer was impeached, that the largest motion picture interests in the country were biding their time. It was only a matter of time when he would be featured in motion pictures, but just in what way has been the subject of much speculation, until quite recently.

The presentation of a four-reel feature, entitled "The Shame of the Empire State" is now made by the Ruby Feature Film Company, 145 West Forty-fifth street, New York. It is announced that the services of Governor Sulzer himself have been secured, which does not seem so surprising when it is remembered that the very title of the film, which is in four reels, suggests action in accordance with the events surrounding his impeachment.

The film deals in narrative form with political history. It shows the methods employed by political parties to defraud by ballot. There is unquestionably a wealth of sensationalism and exciting matter in the portrayal of these methods.

Governor Sulzer himself is an added attraction. The spectator is given an insight of the unswerving devotion of a woman to the man who was being torn from power and glory by the very influence which helped place them in his hands. Employment of gangs of ruffians, and descriptions of their raids upon the State treasury, form a part of the story. To cap the climax, both the political boss and the impeached governor are accorded a treatment in this film for which only intimate study and painstaking analysis of personalities can be responsible.

The Ruby Feature Film Company has secured an exceptional line of lithographs to go with this feature. In another week Governor Sulzer begins a national tour of lectures in which he will tell in more startling detail of the rottenness and corruption of the political organization he is fighting. He promises to give to the country sensational revelations. "The Shame of the Empire State" is being sold in territorial rights.

PLAYS IN FILMS SO FATHER MAY SEE HER

Marguerite Risser, a young actress who is rapidly achieving prominence in the motion picture field with Pathe Freres, entered the profession at the request of her father about a year ago.

Her father, a New Yorker, compelled to travel much of the time by reason of his business, conceived the idea that his loneliness away from home would be relieved if he could only see his daughter moving as in real life upon the screen.

Two months later in Seattle his wish was gratified. While watching a show in a theatre there he was electrified to see Miss Risser taking a prominent part in one of the photoplays exhibited.

It is said that Mr. Risser stayed in the theatre that night until the lights were turned out that he might miss no repetition of the film. As for his daughter, a new zest enters her work as she knows that she is playing to her absent father, who, to her, is the one critic.

RAVER GETS AFTER PIRATES

Harry R. Raver, director-general of the Itala Company, is taking steps to prevent the pirating of Itala films. George W. Timble, of Algoma, Wis., purchased the state rights on "The War Correspondent" for Wisconsin and other states. Recently another firm has been attempting to book a so-called similar feature, and Mr. Timble has been empowered by the Itala Company to seize the film if it comes in his territory.

"I regret this instance very much," said Mr. Raver, "as I was in hopes that pirating in the film business had ceased. We have had no trouble with our films for some time, but we expect to make an example of any pirates we can get our hands on. The Northern Special Feature Film Company is not a buyer of Itala films and any exhibitor renting Itala films from it is liable to have the film seized and to be sued for damages."

KLEINE "POMPEII" A WOMAN'S SHOW

A circular letter sent out to the various managers of George Kleine's "The Last Days of Pompeii" asking them what stood out as the greatest characteristic of the picture in their mind, brought the unanimous opinion that it was a "woman's picture." "The characters in the drama and the trend of the story appeal strongly to the gentle sex," say the managers. This is undoubtedly due to the pretty love story which runs throughout the film, and the appealing work of Nydia, the blind girl.

MEDAL FOR UNIVERSAL

The enterprise of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company in exhibiting its motion pictures at the Electrical Exposition and Motor Show of 1913 at Grand Central Palace, New York City, was given appreciative recognition by the presentation on the part of the management of a gold medal to the officers of the Universal.

The award was made by General Manager Parker, of the Electrical Exposition, and was accepted by General Manager Edward M. Saunders, of the Universal Film Exchange, of New York, acting for the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. He made a short but appropriate speech of thanks.

Eclair to Film Jules Verne Stories

AN interesting announcement is the news issued by the Eclair Film Company, of Paris, that it has obtained the world rights to reproduce in motion picture form the works of the famous novelist, the late Jules Verne. Negotiations for this deal have been on for some time past, and the Eclair Company was only able to successfully close the deal after paying an almost prohibitive price, which runs into thousands of dollars.

Among the first subjects to be launched on the market shortly will be "The Children of Captain Grant" in seven reels, "The Black Indies" in six parts, and that world-famous masterpiece, the story of which is known to everyone on the civilized globe, "Twenty Thousand Leagues Under the Sea," which will be a supreme effort in motion pictures, and we can look forward to new departures.

The Eclair is really to be complimented upon its initiative and progressive spirit in obtaining the motion picture rights to these books.

Among the standing orders secured by Fred E. Holliday, general sales manager of the Ammex Film Company, for Ammex Features are:

Weiland Film Co., of Pittsburgh, Eastern Pennsylvania and West Virginia; Golden Gate Film Co., of Los Angeles and San Francisco, California, Nevada and Arizona; Electric Theatre Supply Co., of Philadelphia, Eastern Pennsylvania and West Virginia; Texas Film Corporation, of Dallas, Texas, and Southern Oklahoma; Northwestern Film Co., of Portland and Seattle, Washington, Oregon and Idaho; Electric Theatre Supply Co., of Baltimore, Maryland, Delaware, District of Columbia and Virginia; Texas Film Corporation, of Atlanta, Georgia, North and South Carolina, Tennessee, Mississippi, Florida and Louisiana; Union Film Co., of Chicago, Northern Illinois.

Remarkable, in view of the Laclede brand of Western features being unknown, save through the reputation of its officers, is the advance sale of the first release slated for distribution November 20.

A Common Sense Argument

Mirroroide advertisements have been read the world over. We do not depend absolutely on advertisements to accomplish the results we have attained. We may quote to you from page 1060 of the Moving Picture World, issued recently, in which Mr. R. W. Buzzell, of the Plaza Theater, Northampton, Mass., writes: "I have a good union operator and a Mirroroide screen, and will back my picture against any other exhibitor." This is partly an abstract. Read it for yourself. This was contained in the Moving Picture World, Sept. 6th issue.

The common sense of the argument is this: that we will cheerfully back Mirroroide up against any screen or projection surface in the world today. Backed up with any amount of cash that any other of our competitors care to designate, as to the merits of a true projection surface and the resulting accomplishments. These tests are to include angle views, close up views, and the practical perspective of the said projection. We have read a number of advertisements from our competitors. Can they do as they claim? We claim they cannot. Then again, Mirroroide is put on the market at a price within the reach of every exhibitor, because we are equipped to turn out, if necessary, two hundred screens weekly, which ensures no delays. We have the proper factory facilities, cash capital, and the proper machinery to do as we claim. If you doubt, our large free samples are convincing.

If you desire recommendations from any portion of the entire universe write us, and we will gladly inform you who has one of our Mirroroide screens in use. There are 4700 Mirroroide screens in use today, which warrants the assertion that Mirroroide is the best by test, and has proven to be superior to any other screen now on the maket, barring none. Get our large free samples. Postage prepaid. Test any way you desire against any other curtain or screen in your town. This is a common-sense argument, and what your eyes see you can't help but believe.

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality — that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

PERSONALITY IN ADVERTISING

PROBABLY the cleverest writer of advertising copy, in this country, is the self-styled sage of East Aurora, Mr. Elbert Hubbard.

MR. HUBBARD is strongly commercial. He can dig a selling idea—often THE selling idea—out of your product with a rare facility. Then with a still rarer knowledge of what the public likes to read he will play it up with the most alluring twists and turns.

BUT—a strong but—it is doubtful if Mr. Hubbard's copy sells goods. That is to say, the other fellow's goods. There is no doubt but that it sells Mr. Hubbard's goods.

IT also sells Hubbard's copy—Mr. Hubbard's services, that is, to other advertisers.

THE trouble with this kind of copy is that it directs attention to the writer rather than to the product he exploits.

AFTER reading one of Elbert Hubbard's (signed) advertisements—they are always signed—you are left only with an impression of the writer's cleverness. You are amused by his epigrams, his wit, his daring phrases.

YOU may be persuaded to buy a copy of the "Philistine"; or you may tell your advertiser friend that the very best thing he can do is to get so clever a copy writer. All of which sells Hubbard products.

BUT what of the product advertised? It has been lost in the shuffle of the copy writer's cleverness.

THIS is a case of too much personality—too much Hubbard.

THERE was "Sunny Jim"! Not long ago this unique little figure was known the country over. He said very cute things, and disported himself in so quaint a way that he acquired a real personality.

PEOPLE talked a great deal about "Sunny Jim." It would have been excellent advertising for Sunny Jim dolls—or some other form of "Sunny Jim." But it finally required a big effort and much money to haul "Sunny Jim" back and harness him to the breakfast food he was designed to sell.

TOO much Sunny Jim! Too much personality—of some one else.

ON the other hand, no one knows—or cares who writes Tiffany copy; but everyone receives from each advertisement a very clear idea of the dignity, fine quality and distinctive art of the Tiffany product.

SO also you are given a lasting impression that Packard cars are "classy"; that Fownes' gloves are good form; that Beechnut delicacies are pure and tasteful. And the copy does it all.

PERSONALITY in advertising copy is excellent. It should be and can be a subtle, sustained selling force.

BUT LET IT BE THE PERSONALITY OF THE PRODUCT ITSELF.

EVERY product—every worth-while product—has a personality, quite as much as an individual. If character, skill, ideals have entered into the making of it, then all of these will be evidenced by the product itself.

THEN let the copy uphold the personality—in words, art and typography. Let it have the same distinctive personality that the product has. Let it sustain this personality. Let it suggest.

AND through suggestion, which is after all the strongest advertising force, it will finally convince the buyer that he wants this product and can depend upon its value and reliability.

WILLIAM ALLEN JOHNSTON.

DEFENSE RESUMES IN PATENTS COMPANY SUIT

Frank L. Dyer, President of General Film Company, on Stand for Three Days Tells How Defendant Company Saved Motion Picture Industry by Bringing Order From Chaos

HEARINGS in the suit of the United States against the Motion Picture Patents Company as a monopoly under the terms of the Sherman anti-trust law were resumed Monday at the Hotel Manhattan, New York City. Taking of testimony by the prosecution was ended several months ago and then followed a long recess while Edward P. Grosvenor, special attorney general, and Joseph R. Darling, special agent of the department of justice, were in the West, busy with the harvester case.

Now the defense is having its innings and, barring days when the attorneys for the defense are busied with other cases, the hearings will go right along until all the evidence is in. It is expected that the hearings will take about five weeks more, as the defense plans to put in testimony from the heads of all the licensed producing firms, either in person or by deposition. Depositions from persons all over the country interested in the motion picture business will also be introduced by the defense, which plans to pile up a formidable mass of accumulative evidence.

This evidence will probably be along the general lines of the testimony given by Frank L. Dyer, president of the General Film Company, whose direct testimony occupied Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday of this week.

His testimony was to the effect that the Motion Picture Patents Company did not stifle competition. That the Patents Company redeemed the motion picture art when it was rapidly going into a state of chaos and that the men in the Patents Company saw the great possibilities in the motion picture industry and bent their efforts to the production of meritorious and artistic pictures were other points made by Mr. Dyer.

IN support of the contention that competition has not been stifled, Mr. Dyer took cognizance at considerable length of the competition of the Mutual and Universal programs. These were the only firms mentioned except the licensed manufacturers.

Monday's session was devoted to a review of motion picture trade conditions before the formation of the Patents Company in December, 1908.

Before the formation of the Patents Company films full of "rain" were frequent. They were used as "chasers" in vaudeville houses. They hurt business. They injured the eyes of the spectators. No theatres now would put up with that kind of pictures, said Mr. Dyer.

Before the formation of the Patents Company Pathe was the predominant factor in the film business. Under the competitive conditions now existing it is not. It has been pulled down from sixty per cent of the business to ten per cent. The amount of prints sold by the various firms in the Patents Company varies as much as three hundred per cent.

The Patents Company firms have always tried to improve the character of motion picture exhibitions by keeping objectionable films off the market. They have changed motion pictures from a side show proposition to a high-class theatrical proposition.

"The licenses granted by the Patents Company are not a right. They are a privilege to be immune from suit."

At the Tuesday session Mr. Dyer continued his testimony, taking up motion picture affairs with the formation of the Patents Company.

Mr. Dyer followed with a lengthy exposition of the details of the motion picture business, details with which those interested in the business are, for the most part, familiar. The object was, of course, to make these facts a matter of record when the case is laid before the Federal judges for review.

As evidence that the motion picture business is now nearing the plane of the high-class theatrical proposition, Mr. Dyer mentioned names of several men who are now entering the motion picture field, among them Augustus Thomas, Richard Harding Davis, Charles Klein and Rex Beach.

He outlined an analogy between the motion picture business and the theatrical business. In this he likened the methods of producing a theatrical attraction and a film and explained the relative methods of routing a show on the road and booking a film ahead. He also dwelt on the many big features coming in, of which "Quo Vadis?" was the first, which are being handled by theatrical people as theatrical attractions.

"AS for the cost of production," he said, "a film which costs two dollars a negative foot to produce can be marketed by a Patents Company firm with profit, I believe, while one costing $2.50 a negative foot to produce will be a loss financially. Between these sums lies the critical point, according to my observations.

"The gross receipts of the motion picture theatres of the country for a year are estimated at $350,000,000. Of this sum the exhibitors pay the various producing firms about ten per cent for their film service. Thus they pay a much lower proportionate rate for their attractions than do the proprietors of legitimate theatres who pay from forty to seventy-five per cent of their gross recepits to foot the bill of the current attraction. The proprietor of a motion picture theatre is really in an enviable position as compared to his brother showman who is putting a theatrical attraction before the public."

The greater part of the session on Wednesday was devoted to proof that the General Film Company, which distributes the films of the licensed manufacturers, has very active and unhampered competition. Mr. Dyer went over the entire country, almost inch by inch, and named the General Film offices and then the competing offices in every bit of territory. In most of the cities having branches of the General Film Company there were exchanges distributing the Mutual and Universal programs. Mr. Dyer stated that the General Film Company needs more distributing offices.

At the close of his testimony Wednesday Mr. Dyer made some very pointed and illuminating remarks.

"Competition is keen and bitter in the motion picture business," he said. "The business and the men in it have not yet become thoroughly civilized. There is not the feeling of courtesy and good will that exists among competitors in other lines. Managers of competing exchanges entertain a personal hostility toward each other. They speak ill of each other freely. They make frantic efforts to get customers by offering various inducements. Thus the competing programs get customers away from us and we get customers away from them. Some customers stick to one program. Others are continually changing every time an inducement is held out to them. The situation is one of fierce competition and all the persons in it are fighting for all they can get."

BRINGING THE OLD WEST BACK

General Miles, Johnny Baker, Indian Chiefs and Other Frontier Celebrities Revive Days of Indian Wars for Essanay—This Is the First Real Story of a Great Historical Undertaking

By CHARLES J. VER HALEN

TO reap, and reap bountifully after you have sown, is a pleasure in itself that converts the toil of labor into joy. When a big idea becomes a realization that is an accomplishment worthy of being placed on a high pinnacle. When the undertaking is of such magnitude that the eyes of a whole industry are concentrated on its consummation, its successful completion is indeed an achievement.

GENERAL MAUS, GENERAL MILES, AND PRODUCERS THEODORE WHARTON AND JOHNNY BAKER

In this country of ours there is history on record that has an inherent interest to all of us, and that will have an added charm when it flashes before our vision just as it happened, and with many of the prominent characters who helped to make it portraying over again the battles in which they were sometimes victorious and sometimes defeated.

With the return of the producers, camera-men and others whom George K. Spoor sent to Cody, Wyoming, for Essanay, a permanent record has been made of a bit of history which very nearly eradicated a mighty nation, the Sioux Indian.

There is nothing of fiction about this picture. It will contain events just as they transpired according to the statements of those who at the time of the original war were in its very midst.

Chiefs, bucks, and squaws, generals, officers and soldiers who held arms against each other in the battles of '90 and '91 again opposed each other on the very field they did some twenty odd years ago. Memories stirred in them of the real affray and they lived over again a period of their life which was at once painful in its recalling.

BUFFALO BILL, GENERAL MILES AND INDIAN CHIEF

Theodore Wharton, one of the producers whom Mr. Spoor assigned to take these pictures for the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, returned recently to Chicago burdened with many thrilling experiences, none more so, however, than the actual scenes as they are registered by the camera. For several days previous to the taking of the first battle scene the air seemed to be charged with danger; both Indians and soldiers were loath to commence operations. It was during this battle many years ago that so many on both sides were lost, not only soldiers, but women and children.

During the entire taking of the picture the squaws chanted their death song as they did years ago when they saw the brave warriors fall under the rain of bullets. Many of them broke into tears as the vividness of the battle recalled that other time when lives were really lost and everything was actual.

Even the chieftains, now grown gray, and used to the sight of bloodshed from the innumerable battles, told of those days with a tremor in their voice. That battle was not only the start of a warfare that deprived them of power, but of brothers, relatives, wives and children. Those of the other forces who remembered that day of battle, such as General Miles and Buffalo Bill, felt a lump growing in their throats as they lived over again in each other's company the days of '90.

Things as this that will affect such strong men as assembled on the old battlefield are truly historic and worthy of the efforts of the man that has undertaken to put them on film. George K. Spoor has delved into a subject that is dear to the hearts of all Americans, and made permanent for them that gone-by period which in time would lose its vividness.

Such battles as Wounded Knee and the Battle of the Messiah form part of this production, and show Chief Short Bull, who visited the fake Messiah that arose at that time, and at his advice started the battle. Jack Red Cloud, son of Chief Red Cloud, also takes part in these battles. Jack Red Cloud, with Goodlance and Iron Crow, were among the peace envoys that visited General Miles. Woman Dress, another old warrior, takes part. Aside from these battles he was associated with General Crook's command in '76

Dewy Beard, still considered a hero among his tribe, appears in his ghost shirt, which still bears the marks of five bullet holes. Dewy Beard was the last to surrender at the time of the battle, and held off the soldiers for fourteen hours from his place of vantage.

Brave men's names as these appear little in history, however their heroism deserves the praise of all. Its memory should live forever. Besides General Miles and Colonel Cody, Colonel H. S. Sickel, who is now in command of the Twelfth Cavalry, was then a lieutenant in the Seventh; General Maus, General King and General Lee were there to replay their parts. Philip Wells, a half-breed Indian, still bears scars of battle. He at that time was official interpreter, and during one of the battles had his nose cut off, but the quick action of an attending physician saved this organ to him.

Nine weeks were spent in the taking of this picture and 10,000 people employed, besides many prairie schooners, tents and so on. Mr Wharton before leaving was adopted into the Sioux nation and given the name of Waubli Wicasa, meaning Eagle Man.

FACE TO FACE WITH THE JUNGLE

Paul J. Rainey Hunt Pictures Now to Be Placed Before Inhabitants of Smaller Cities and Towns—Remarkable Visualization of Wild Life in Africa Taken From Nature

WHAT now seems a long time ago, Paul J. Rainey, millionaire, sportsman and explorer, sailed for Africa, accompanied by J. C. Hemment, an expert photographer, and party containing several scientists, to hunt the wild game of that country with a motion camera instead of a gun. The idea was new at the time and attracted much attention.

When Rainey returned the motion pictures he had taken proved a sensation. He had successfully transferred to six thousand feet of film many intimate glimpses of the inhabitants of the jungle. The subject matter of the pictures was entirely new. It explored undeveloped territory. It showed the great beasts of Africa many times in close views.

Lions, buffalo, rhinoceri, leopards, jackals, antelopes, all these and innumerable other lesser beasts and birds as well, were shown on the screen. Perhaps the most talked of single scene was the one at the water-hole. With his camera focused on the water-hole, the photographer waited day after day before he got results, but when he did get them they were worth the while.

Buffalo, deer, gnu, antelope, elephants and birds of all kinds were seen parading down to the water-hole for that precious drink for which many of them risked their lives. For the predatory animals watch the water-hole, as it is their surest way of making a "kill."

As the milder animals troop down the declivities leading to the spring, the fiercer beasts lie in wait. On this account it was no easy matter to get the pictures, but they were finally obtained and are especially interesting.

J. C. HEMMENT AND A HUGE RHINOCEROS

Hunt scenes are also shown. There are pictures showing herds of antelope and deer in full flight, others showing them caught off their guard. Some of these scenes show the wary animals back in the middle distance. Others show them well in the foreground. Then there are the exciting parts. These include the hunts of many kinds. There is the pack of big hounds on the trail of a lion, fighting with the king of beasts, and, finally, worrying the body at the kill. Another scene with much action shows the lassoing of a rhinoceros, and many others show chases and hunts of various kinds.

Panoramic views are utilized very frequently to keep up with the action, which necessarily is very swift and covers considerable territory. Then there are pictures showing the camp, the army of negro camp-followers and burden-bearers, and the pack of big dogs carried with the outfit. Trophies of the chase in the shape of animals killed in the hunt may be seen in many of the views.

These pictures were taken under apparently insurmountable difficulties, which were, for the most part, overcome manfully. They were the first of their kind and also the best. Other pictures of African animal wild life followed them into this country, but did not create nearly as much of a furore.

When first brought to America they ran for about nine months on Broadway, New York, at the Bijou Theatre, with prices ranging up to one dollar. They were also exhibited in several other large cities on a corresponding price scale. But there were many cities not touched. In fact, the pictures have not been shown in any but the few largest cities of the country. Now they will reach the smaller cities and towns, for it has been decided to dispose of the pictures on a State-rights basis. The pictures are being handled by the Jungle Film Company, with offices on the fourth floor of the Mecca Building at 1600 Broadway.

PASQUALI "POMPEII" IN TOO GREAT DEMAND

The phenomenal success of the Pasquali production, "The Last Days of Pompeii," has opened the eyes of the managers of houses who have been playing legitimate attractions when they could get them.

Most of these managers booked the Pasquali picture the first time because it was handed to them by Klaw & Erlanger, who controlled their houses. Klaw & Erlanger have been flooded with telegrams since the picture has played, asking for an extension of the bookings and for return dates, showing that most of these managers have had a revelation as to the possibilities of the pictures as business getters.

The Pasquali Company is sending out new road companies to meet this demand as fast as they can be organized, but up to date has not been able to keep up with its bookings.

The Santa Barbara exhibit at the Panama Exposition will include motion pictures of all the principal features of Santa Barbara County. Julius Frankenburg and J. W. Brown, of the American Film Manufacturing Company staff, recently produced "Bean Thrashing" as a part of the series of views to be shown at the fair.

PAUL J. RAINEY LASSOES A RHINOCEROS

TELE-PHOTOGRAPHIC MOTION PICTURES

How the Motion Picture Can Annihilate Space

HUMAN life cannot be sustained or rather it cannot continue to exist at a greater distance from the earth than six and a half miles. Fifty years ago the aeronauts, James Glaisher and Henry Coxwell, ascended in a balloon to that height. They just retained sufficient consciousness to make records of their experiences and feelings. They were almost frozen to death by the rarefaction above them. Nobody has ascended as high as that since. It is doubtful if they ever will. These men were in the prime of life and physical condition. Mr. Glaisher, whom we personally knew, lived to 92.

We get from this some idea of the limitations of the motion picture as a recording agency off the earth. Now and again there are instances where aviators ascend and use the motion picture camera for terrestrial records. But they are limited in their ascents to a few thousand feet. Nevertheless, it can be seen that for military purposes aerial motion picture work can be made valuable.

What is a tele-photographic motion picture? It is simply a picture of an object a long way off—or, to put it in another way, it is a direct enlarged view of a distant object. Let us make this clearer. Suppose you went to the top of the Woolworth Building in New York City and on a clear day pointed your motion picture camera right over New York Bay into the Atlantic. And suppose the Imperator was on the water many miles off. If you took a motion picture of what was in front of the camera with a lens of the ordinary focal length, say three inches, you might obtain in your picture, if the intervening atmosphere was perfectly clear, a speck of the ship. But if your lens was made of considerably longer focal length by means of a telescopic attachment affixed to its posterior axis, that is, behind it and between the lens and film, you would get a much larger image. You would not get so much ocean in your picture, but you would get more Imperator.

In other words, it is perfectly feasible for a motion picture camera man to follow the progress of this great ship a hundred miles off right up into the Bay. To put it another way, he could point his tele-photographic camera at her and get a couple thousand feet of her miles and miles away showing all the detail on the ship and the expressions on the faces of the people.

We select this illustration of the Atlantic Ocean, the Imperator and the Woolworth Building in order to make clear our meaning. It is all comparatively easy to do. But now let us apply this teaching to everyday subjects that come before the motion picture camera. After the recent World's Series Baseball games, we saw some of the results on the screen at some of the theatres, and we were much disappointed with them. The figures on the diamond were quite small. They were just mannikins rushing about the field. It would have been perfectly feasible for the photographer to have got farther away, using a tele-photographic lens, and to show these figures much larger. There would not have been so much of the stands and the people in the picture, but there would have been more of the game and the players—what they did and how they did it.

We shall be writing on this subject frequently, as we desire to interest motion picture camera men in it. In ordinary photography, telescopic work is quite common. Photographs of objects ninety miles distant from the camera have been taken. Photographs from balloons have been taken showing military dispositions and fortifications. The application of the motion picture to the work by the same optical principle is a natural and logical one.

Kearton, the well-known motion picture photographer of animals, uses the tele-photographic principle. The equivalent focus of his lens is eight inches. Practical camera men will realize what this means. Eight inches is about three times the equivalent focal length of the lenses ordinarily used on motion picture cameras. So he gets a much larger picture of a distant object or an animal than the ordinary camera will give.

"GOOD PHOTOGRAPHY" HIS SLOGAN

Burr McIntosh Is Coming Back to the Public Eye via the Screen, But, Oh, How He Will Watch the Technical End of the Picture!

"PHOTOGRAPHY—that's at least fifty per cent of the film. I know something about it and you can bet it's going to be good when I make my debut upon the screen."

This is the slogan of Burr McIntosh, burly Burr McIntosh, actor, author, war correspondent, publisher and photographer extraordinary, who is coming back to the public eye through the medium of motion pictures in general and the All Star Feature Corporation in particular.

For he is going to play Jo Vernon, the blacksmith, in the coming production of Augustus Thomas' "In Mizzoura," and will again hide behind a tropical growth of chin foliage as he did just twenty years ago when he created the part at the play's first production in Hooley's Theatre, Chicago.

Burr McIntosh is the latest recruit from the genus genius to the ranks of the motion picture. He is a host in himself. That is to say, his heft makes him formidable. But his heft extends above the collar way up into his brain and he thinks; thinks weightily and definitely.

Wednesday last he overflowed Joe Farnham's chair in the uncharted office which Joe occupies in the interest of All Star and talked interestingly about himself and motion pictures; himself in the past and pictures in the future tense.

STRENGTH IN EVERY LINE

As for Burr McIntosh, he has been all things. Way back in 1885 he started his stage career, which he abandoned in 1911 and took up for a few months again last Winter. He was war correspondent and freelance through the war with Spain. The lecture platform knows him well.

He originated the Burr McIntosh Monthly which died when he left it, but he may possibly do a resurrection stunt with it. All these things he did well.

But photography is the calling which engrossed him. So for the past year or two he has been busy on the Pacific Coast with his own studio. After "still" photography came motion photography. In fact he is right now organizing the Burr McIntosh Moving Picture Company. "Why, the name itself is an asset," he argues.

"Fifty per cent of the value of a screen production lies in the photography," he reiterated Wednesday. "Photography has been my hobby. I have studied it. I know that when a man goes to motion pictures the clear but mellow photography is what he wants to see. He wants to see it more than he realizes. For his eyes will balk at poor photography and he will leave the theatre displeased. He won't know why. But poor photography will be to blame.

"The day is coming when all motion picture photography will be the clear-cut, cameo kind which is now hailed with delight. Then it will be the common thing. But until that day comes, until every picture on the screen is a delight to the eye, I won't be happy. I have been watching the All Star people. To-day I saw some of their productions not yet released. I know they have the same idea. We are going to work together and you will like the result.

"Yes, I'm glad to be back with my old friend, Augustus Thomas. I doubt if anyone else could have lured me East from my happy home where I have been growing younger every day and got me to don grease paint and whiskers again. You know, Jo Vernon has a flowing beard and you must be very careful of your make-up before that awful lens which catches everything. We are going to Florida to make the picture. I know I'll sweat and stew under the grease paint and beard, but that's not what cuts most.

"To make the joining of hair and beard perfect I've had to let my hair grow at the side. I used to be good looking, but now I have long locks over the temples."

So saying he pushed back a contrary lock. And all he needs is hair to make him a modern Samson.

He needs nothing more to make him a motion picture luminary. Actor, author, war correspondent, publisher, photographer—what better biography for a "who's who" in motion pictures. G. D. P.

OH, IT'S AN INTERESTING LIFE!

Punctuated by GEORGE D. PROCTOR

"A DRAMA of Crime." This cute little electric sign, in letters about two feet high, heralds a current theatrical attraction at one of the theatres in our local Main street, here in N' Yawk. A theatrical attraction can be advertised as "a drama of crime." Can a motion picture be similarly advertised? Not right now, anyway. This isn't an argument for or against censorship or anything else. It's just a little observation on things as they are.

M. A. Neff, of Cincinnati, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America, dropped in for a short call Tuesday.

"Make three reels for a nickel and four reels for a dime your slogan," he said. "That's all I want. Put just those two little lines in your paper and they'll attract more attention from Maine to California and mean more to the exhibitors than any other ten lines in your paper."

Well, there they are.

"Ohio was never stronger than today. The Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America never had so strong an organization as it has today," continued Mr. Neff, hitting his stride conversationally. "We've had our troubles in Ohio, but I want to tell you that the convention which will be held at the Sinton Hotel, Cincinnati, January 27, 28 and 29, will be the greatest thing ever held in the Middle West, and I don't bar the national Chicago convention of 1912, either.

"I've been up through New England looking things over. Maine has a beautiful organization. Massachusetts will have a strong one. That state is being reorganized and the job is being done right this time. Connecticut, I'm sorry to say, has no organization. I wish I could get in touch with the right sort of man to organize that state.

"But don't overlook that Cincinnati convention. You know the Kentucky people will be meeting right across the river at the same time. I want to see you all there." And so saying he departed.

Something may be expected soon from Ambrosio. M. A. Stevani, president of the Ambrosio American Company and the Raw Film Supply Company, is back in town after an absence of six months in Europe. He arrived on the Olympic along with several other notables. His first action was to drop a few sottò voce hints that he expects to spring something very shortly. He says he will shortly bring into this country big productions which will beat the Ambrosio "Last Days of Pompeii," which George Kleine is handling. He has several features of from three to eight reels in length coming. By the way, he will probably select an American sales manager to succeed Eddie Barry. Just wait and see whom he picks.

As the cards are shuffled, don't overlook Billy Quirk, of uncertain age, but still playing bell boys. Billy calls himself "the boy comic," and he's right. Let's see. Billy started with Pathe. Then he was with the Universal. Now he has been on the verge of going out with his own act in vaudeville, but several manufacturers have been flirting with him so he has been putting the act thing off. I have an idea that he's just about to sign up. More later.

AND HE CALLS HIMSELF "THE BOY COMIC"

All one has to do to be rated a "wise guy" in the motion picture business right now is to wait until the other fellow says something and then contradict him. Try it. It's so simple.

Winsor H. Scofield, late of the Ambrosio American Company, returned from England on the Lusitania with the American and Canadian agency for the Gloria films, produced at Turin, Italy, under his arm. These films are produced by Mario Caserini, who was chief producer with Cines and Ambrosio. The leading man is Mario Bonnard, who played the title role in the Ambrosio "Satan." Lyda Borelli, an Italian actress of repute, but new to pictures, is the leading woman. The first production is "The Ghost Club," a six-reeler featuring Mr. Bonnard. The films will be handled here by the Scofield Company.

This is an era of inflated figures, and the worst is yet to come. If this be treason, make the most of it.

G. P. Hamilton, president and general manager of the Albuquerque Film Manufacturing Company, of Albuquerque, N. M., dropped in early in the week for a short chat. He opened with these always welcome words: "I am a subscriber and I read the paper every week, so I thought I'd drop in and look you over."

Mr. Hamilton had something to say when he got started. He is a man with a wide practical knowledge of the motion picture business in the technical end, the producing end, and the exhibiting end. He can tell Eastman stock by the smell and has all the earmarks of an expert. His firm will probably produce two three-reel features a month, one to be released on the Warner's Features program. He and Milton Fahrney will act as directors and a bunch of the old St. Louis Motion Picture Company will be engaged in the producing end, including Geo. W. ("Buck") Connor. "Buck," by the way, has just been presented with a bronze medal by the War Department in recognition of service with the civilian scouts thirteen years ago in the Philippines under the late Major Archibald Butt. Because of his bravery he was recommended by Major Butt for promotion to a lieutenancy.

The producing plant of Hamilton's concern will be in Albuquerque, as might be expected. Western pictures will be produced, real ones, which do not misrepresent the frontier days.

Here's Mr. Hamilton's dope on the situation through New Mexico and the adjoining states from the exhibitor's point of view:

"Features are the thing right now," he said. "They're all using features, mostly the three-reelers. The exhibitors in the West will go to all sorts of trouble to book a feature, and then they play it up well in advance, especially the fellows in the remote and inaccessible towns where it is hard to get features because of shipping troubles. Features sure have a grip on them out there."

There you are. The exhibitor wants features, take it from G. P. Hamilton. If he wants them he will get them, and he won't bother about the effect they will have on the business of the future. As long as a feature has more merit than a single reel production, I'm in favor of it.

John Steppling, sterling John Steppling, all wool and several yards wide, is coming back to pictures after a season in stock in San Francisco. He has joined Albert R. Christie's company, which is making Nestor pictures on the Universal program. I'm sincerely glad to see John back. He is a finished portrayer of character parts.

For two years he was with the Eastern Essanay company. He originated the Billy McGrath series. Then he came East and was with the Famous Players for a while. His work in "Tess" as John D'Urberville was a delight. John made his debut under Daniel Frohman in the old Lyceum stock company. He has been with E. H. Sothern and was in the original production of "The Prisoner of Zenda." Now he is back in pictures. Good!

Now the small exhibitor will have a chance at the Paul J. Rainey African hunt pictures. These pictures broke all records in the dollar houses. They played on Broadway for many months at a dollar a head and did good business. Now they will be sold on a state rights basis. They are a very live proposition. They haven't touched any of the second-class cities. They ought to pack 'em in when shown in the places of from 5,000 to 500,000 population. They have the rep. and they have the merit.

Nearly Scandal

Larry Griffith is gathering his forces around him at the Reliance studio. James Kirkwood is coming over as a director as soon as he finishes "Strongheart" for the K. and E. Biograph combine. Griffith showed up at the Reliance studio every Tuesday with a company of about fifteen of his old Biograph players. Dame Rumor hath it that Griffith may take a trip to the coast in a couple of weeks. He may take Kirkwood along and leave him there at the New Majestic plant near Los Angeles.

William F. Haddock, the "Silent Bill" well loved by all the members of the Screen Club, and Miss Rosa Koch, of Brooklyn, will be married November 18, it is announced. Miss Koch, who has been playing with Eclair for some time, will desert the screen. In the meantime Bill has hooked up for good and all with the All Star Feature Corporation.

Philip Mindil, whose pen has been ever so active for, lo, these many years, has founded and taken charge of the publicity department of the Mutual Film Corporation. When he skips through the adolescent stage and finds out that exhibitors don't care if motion pictures ARE projected sixteen to a second, he will make them all hustle, for he is an old hand at the publicity thing.

PICTURES AS A COMMON LANGUAGE

THE motion picture speaks, or should speak, not merely an international language, but a language understood by all the people of the world. Last week there was printed in these pages a thoughtful article which was a plea for and a prediction of the time when a method of titling should be adopted which all people could read and understand. While it is no doubt desirable there should be a language common to all people, it is doubtful if we are within measurable distance of such accomplishment. According to Holy Writ, when the people met on the Tower of Babel and agreed to differ, it was because they were suddenly stricken with an inability to understand each other. In other words, confusion of tongues arose.

ON former occasions reference may have been made on these pages to the influence which great paintings have on the motion picture. It has been suggested that great paintings should be taken as the basis of good motion pictures. Why? Simply because great paintings speak a language understood by all. If you want evidence of this you have only to go into some great art gallery such as the Metropolitan Art Museum of New York City to perceive the truth of what is said here. In that gallery you will see many great works by old masters that everybody can understand.

THE same should apply to the motion picture. Everybody should understand a motion picture—preferably without the use of sub-titles. It is regarded as a triumph of the motion picture artist that he can make a picture which does not require subtitling. But it is rarely done. We are, however, advancing toward that desirable consummation. Some time ago there was produced in this country and shown at the Lyceum Theatre, New York City, a five-reel picture entitled "Tess of the D'Urbervilles. This was an American-made film on a purely English subject. It received great praise from the critics in this country. Yet though it depicted a story supposedly acted in a foreign land, it was made in Westchester County, New York, if I am correctly informed. This, if a personal triumph for the Famous Players Co., also helps forward, it is to be assumed, the millennium of the motion picture—the time when pictures will be made that are understood by all people of all kinds. You have an example of this condition of things in the "Last Days of Pompeii." Everybody knows this theme and it seems that everybody understands this picture. Hence its great success.

GREAT plays and great books as well as great pictures ("still" pictures are meant) acquire universal comprehension. It marks the success of a great novel, for example, if it is translated into many languages. Similarly with plays. As for great paintings, you may find reproductions of them all over the world. We must reach the same condition of things with regard to motion pictures. In a measure we do at times. Not to anything like the extent possible. There is still too much internationalism about the picture. For example, in South America only French and Italian subjects go. And so on with other parts of the world.

THE world is unfortunately still split up into a number of parochial localities. Some such ideas as these of mine may be in the minds of the Cines Company of Rome, who are instituting a great dramatic international competition. This competition is opened till April 30, 1914. It is for motion picture dramas. Particulars of the competition are to be obtained from the directors of the Cines Company, Via Macerata 51, Rome, Italy.

THE Cines Company offers as a first prize, $5,000; second, $1,000; third, $500; fourth, $200; fifth, $100. These prizes are set aside for original scenarios. The Cines Company makes great pictures. It is in its power to select great themes for their scenarios. The prizes are worth trying for by the best writers of the world. They should bring out original ideas—ideas which are generally understood. If the judges, who appear to be men of repute and position, exercise their functions with discretion, they may help forward the time when motion pictures will be made which all will understand without sub-titles.

THE AVERAGE AMERICAN EXHIBITOR

A Review of Some of the Trials and Tribulations Besetting the Backbone of American Producing Companies

By E. J. HUDSON

THE president of a large corporation controlling one branch of the manufacture of a certain well-known staple commodity, feeling the first symptoms of an attack of a disease familiarly known as progressive commercialism, sought to obtain a deeper insight into the characters and lives of the many men throughout the United States who retailed his goods. They were the storekeepers in cities and towns from the smallest to the largest in population.

The managers of his sales and advertising departments, called into the conference, very wisely professed their inability to shoulder the responsibility of the task. The president, mentally recalling the amounts standing opposite their names on the payroll, scowled at their professed incompetence. The advertising manager spoke:

Only Human, After All

"Why not call upon a student of human nature. I read recently of a man in New York who claims to be an analyst of human nature." Acting upon this suggestion, the analyst was summoned. Learning the president's wish to become more familiar with his retailers, their home life, business knowledge, their troubles and mannerisms, he departed on a three months' trip.

He returned with an expense account out of all proportion to the distance he had traveled, and submitted a lengthy written report. Reduced to its essentials, the report, translated from verbiage befitting the author of a dictionary, read:

"They are just like anyone else."

The corporation president smiled knowingly, showed the summarized report to his sales and advertising managers, and said:

"Act accordingly!"

An exhibitor, defined as such by manufacturers of programs and features, sometimes called other things by exchange managers and salesmen, to his employees either "the boss" or "the old man," and to his patrons, "Mr. So and So, who owns Such and Such Theatre," is necessarily "just like anyone else." If he was otherwise, P. T. Barnum or Joe Bailey would never have permitted him to go unmolested to this day.

The Exhibitor as a Business Man

Unless his reels fail to arrive on the Limited, or he is under the care of a physician, he follows practically the same form of activity as does any business man. It is in his environment, the theatre, and among his business associates that he differs from the average business man.

His business, or profession, is esentially one of constant activity and mental energy. Competition is much more keen and dangerous than in any other line. A dealer in automobiles has a selling campaign, the surface aspect of which changes but little from week to week. The groceryman has his stock in trade, and no one ever saw labels on ketchup bottles, or brands of butter and sugar, change over night.

The average exhibitor, every Saturday, and sometimes on Monday, receives a printed program of pictures scheduled for his theatre the following week. Sometimes he gets them all, and sometimes he doesn't. A "repeater" has caused more whitened hairs than any so-called restorative ever invented. It is then that his ingenuity is called into play. He must either take the chance that no one who had seen the "repeater" would return on that night, or drop it entirely from the show, and instruct his operator to "slow down." The "repeater" is seldom the fault of anyone, but it serves to add one more burden to the daily life of the average American exhibitor.

Unlike his fellow-retailers in the automobile, grocery, drug, hardware and clothing lines, he has, up to the present time, received little or no so-styled "dealer helps" from the concern whose pictures he rents. This has not been the fault of the manufacturers, nor the exchangemen, but rather is due to the rapid influx of business, which has grown faster than is usual in any commercial line, permitting attention only to things immediately at hand.

His Problems Increased by Isolation

Away out in the wilds of Indiana, Illinois, Montana or California, the exhibitor is far from the center of activity in his business. About the only representatives he sees from whom he has been able to glean ideas and suggestions have been booking agents for State-rights buyers, his own local competitors, or the exchange representative. To all appearances he is engaged in a one-man business. As a further handicap, few exhibitors first opening theatres have had any previous experience in the management of a house. They realized the opportunities, and, like many men bent on success, gritted their teeth and plunged in.

Apart from difficult problems arising within his own theatre, the exhibitor is set upon and harassed from all sides by local censor boards, the police, the clergy, and the charitable clubs. He has been their first and only consideration. Any stigma which may have been attached to the film industry in the past has rested almost wholly upon the exhibitor. But with the instinct for meeting serious problems which enables him to remain an exhibitor, he has successfully dodged or met the issue, and in few instances has he been other than victorious.

Although the manufacture of film was begun a considerable period before exhibiting became an acknowledged business, the exhibitor, despite his handicaps, lack of precedent, and the almost insurmountable barriers standing between him and success, has to-day outdistanced the average manufacturer, and, from a business standpoint, is far in the lead.

Exhibiting Has Outdistanced Manufacturing

Like a good business man, he has invested his profits, studied his market, and from the darkness surrounding his first ventures in two-hundred-feet subjects, projected in poorly-lighted, illy-ventilated "shacks," he has emerged into the light of modern business to greet the multiple-reel productions with theatres that are marvels in architecture, objects of praise in their elegant splendor and refinement, and monuments of prosperity to their builders.

It is safe to say, and true, if thought is given to the statement from a comparative standpoint, that the average exhibitor has made a heavier investment, risked more, fought harder and surmounted more obstacles than the manufacturers who supply him with film.

A film made five years ago, taken on a comparative basis, cost but little more than does the average release of to-day. The present supply is much more elaborate in detail, presents greater possibilities, and is, of course, a much superior production. But have manufacturers reinvested their first profits, and made as great an effort to preserve and increase the scope of their endeavors as have the exhibitors?

The manufacturers of a program make a release. A certain sale is assured by their exchanges. The exchanges, in turn, are virtually assured of so much revenue in rentals. But what about the exhibitor? He has little or no voice in the making of the picture. He is obliged to take it; arrange the paper in his lobby, and then hope and pray that the public will be attracted. This is not intended as a comment on present-day releases, for good pictures are no longer a thing of the future, but merely to emphasize the apparent helplessness of the average exhibitor in the selection of those wares which will attract the greatest possible business for his theatre.

He takes what he gets, and does his best with it. That is one fact, although often the subject of protest, which has made the exhibitor the keen-minded, superior business-getter that he is today. Perhaps if he had been given a voice in the selection of scenarios, or had been permitted to specify the type of production he desired, he would have been less competent in making circumstances fit conditions. It would certainly have deprived him of many valuable lessons in quick thinking and ingenuity, two things which are heavy contributors to his success.

A Man of Many Abilities

The exhibitor, to make his house yield a legitimate profit, must be many-sided. By necessity he is an ardent student of human nature, and has learned to judge in a moment whether a patron is pleased or not. He is the actual buttress between the manufacturer and exchangeman and the theatre-going public. He gets many hard knocks, but few exhibitors have ever been seriously crippled in receiving them. Aside from the public, he has his employees to train and discipline—and this is far from the least of his worries. He has to inculcate in them the value of courtesy; the necessity for constant vigilance in watching for opportunities to make friends of his patrons, and the need for a general knowledge of business methods which enters into every department of theatre management.

Then he must be a student of projection. His operator understands that point, but when the operator is ill, or leaves for a day, he is usually obliged to take things in hand in the projection booth. Then there is the detail of advertising. It is the breath of life to his business, and he can't afford to overlook it. But to get his money's worth in increased patronage, he first must know how to advertise. In many instances this has been a costly lesson, with no help from any source. Three national advertising campaigns recently planned have scared the wrinkles from many faces poring over ledgers and day-books in offices in the back of theatres.

The exhibitor's business day begins almost with sunrise. The theatre must be thoroughly cleaned; the reels obtained from the local express office and inspected; the posters hung, and advertisements written for the day's program and for advance notices. Then the more ingenious ones make their own slides. Music must be selected to conform with the day's program. If an usher, the manager or box-office girl fail to report for work, there comes a hasty skirmish for an understudy, and a day of worry over the selected one

Then he is sure that many of his friends will attend the theatre either in the afternoon or evening. If he is not present to welcome them in person, they feel slighted, as many exhibitors will affirm. In spare moments he devotes his time to his family, keeping his books, studying and seeking new methods of management, striving to meet and outdistance competition.

Each theatre is a business unto itself. Its commercial course must be studied and charted, its market awakened to the point of investment, and its every angle studied for a weak point which would permit inroads from competition. It is the ultimate goal of the manufacturer and exchangeman, while the exhibitor must reach out beyond to that varying, moodish and thoroughly unreliable, but absolutely vital factor in his success—the public. And upon his success depends the success of others in filmdom.

A broader vision of his possibilities have entered into the exhibitor's daily life, and he is grasping out and securing them. He has graduated from the initial stages of his business, and with a wealth of experience in shattered hopes, fallen ambitions, unprofitable ideas, worthless investments, and unrealized desires strewn in the path behind him, he is launching forth into a more intimate knowledge of exhibiting as a profession, to be constantly studied and improved upon.

A Benediction to the Average American Exhibitor

His hardships have increased rather than diminished his determination. His losses have been as guide-posts to a better future. His character has been vilified by seekers of publicity, but he has remained an exhibitor. Employees have deserted in a body, but he has stayed and fought. Pictures have been bad, but he has used his ingenuity as a cloak. He has been shunted about without end, but has managed to keep on a straight track.

Perhaps if some analyst probed deep enough he would find that the average American exhibitor, like the retailers who handled the corporation's product, "is just like anyone else," deserving of every consideration and assistance in his daily struggle to increase the popularity of motion pictures.

CHARLES V. HENKEL

The friends of C. V. (Charlie) Henkel will be interested to learn that his first feature release will shortly be made. It is on the subject of the "Three Musketeers." It will be in six reels. It will probably be followed by many pictures similarly ambitious in theme.

Mr. Henkel has had considerable experience in the picture field. He was one of the originators of the Powers Company, four years ago, having come into the motion picture field from the phonograph industry. After the Powers Company, he initiated the Crown Feature Company, which released many notable productions such as "St. George and the Dragon," "Dante's Inferno" and others. The Crown Feature Film Company for a time released the well-known Milano pictures which were of great beauty and interest.

Mr. Henkel has not been active in the picture field since leaving the Universal. As announced several months ago it has always been his intention to take a prominent part in the feature business. This he is now about to do. Mr. Henkel is a practical picture man, in that he understands the entire production and preparation of the picture. He is a practical photographer, a competent judge of scenarios and also inferentially and directly, of pictures themselves.

Then he knows his market and having a considerable following in the business, he should meet with success. T. B.

PHILADELPHIA PLANS "RALLY"

At a special meeting held in the Parkway Building, the Philadelphia Local of the Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania decided to hold an open "rally" meeting at the same place on the first Sunday afternoon in December. The idea and object of the rally meeting will be to induce all Philadelphia exhibitors who are not now members to join the league and to wake up those who are members into greater activity for the betterment of conditions.

In order to encourage new membership the charter has been declared open for three months and the initiation fee will not be required.

Mr. Jefferies, state president, conducted the meeting. In his opening remarks he called attention to the fact that the operators have formed a very strong organization and suggested that the League co-operate with them rather than take a stand of fighting the union.

Short addresses were made by Messrs. Stiefel, Hayman, Benn, Rappaport, Segal, Berman, Rogasner and Solomon. All these spoke in favor of a stronger organization and increasing the membership.

The matter of program length was brought up but nothing was decided at this time. This matter will come up again at the "rally" meeting in December. A committee was appointed to communicate with every exhibitor in Philadelphia and vicinity regarding the boosting of the League and inviting the non-members to the big meeting. The committee is Mr. Fisher, chairman; Messrs. Benn, Greenberg, Wheeler and Hayman.

FOR THOSE WHO WORRY O'ER PLOTS AND PLAYS

WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT

HOPP HADLEY, advertising and publicity manager, who was formerly scenario editor for Reliance, an acknowledged headliner in the world of photoplay writing, makes a quick touchdown with the following statement to News readers: "Theatre programs and billboards have for so many years shouted aloud the name of the author responsible for the effort-otherwise, that it seems a fact that all authors should be given due credit for their work no matter where or how it is presented to the general public. In fact, there is no good reason why the motion picture producer should be the one and only exception to a generally accepted rule." In other words, refer the question to our legal friend, Blackstone, and there is no argument.

From the standpoint of the public, which, after all, is the business standpoint, the author of a photoplay should be announced at every opportunity, if for no other reason than its news value and the added interest and added dignity it gives to the photoplay. Undoubtedly it is a good "business" move for more reasons than one. We may, for instance, be impressed by the fact that "The Greater Evil" is advertised to appear or is about to be shown in a certain theatre. But there is little doubt that we are more impressed by the fact that "The Greater Evil," by Ralph L. Earl, is the attraction, even though we don't know the said Earl or any of his kin. Strange as it may seem at first blush, names are valuable even where they are not known. Ask any newspaper man!

Now add to these few thoughts the fact that photoplay writers are as scarce as hens' teeth, almost, and that it is good business to encourage them, or, at least, not to discourage them by refusing them equally fair treatment with that accorded them by the magazine world, and you have established a fair case. For more than a year, to my knowledge, the Reliance has been giving credit to its authors on the screen, on the posters, in advertising, and through the columns of the moving picture magazines. However, it is not a fixed rule with the company and many exceptions have occurred. But it seems safe to predict that all companies will eventually announce the author's names. Why? Because Mr. and Mrs. Public are interested in names."

The above is an excellent argument for author's credit. The city editor of the newspaper orders the staff writer to "get all the names you can, for it makes friends for the paper." To the film manufacturer we would advise to use all the names you properly can, for you make the writer and the writer's friends your friends. The eritor of the Writer's Magazine is urging the author's credit to all articles and verses clipped from exchanges and newspapers. How much more important it is to credit the name of the author of a creditable photoplay on the screen.

At what length of contact does a kiss cease to become an affectionate caress? This is one of the latest of the questions pondered by the Ohio State Board of Moving Picture Censors, as the result of the profuse osculation that has been evident, the Censors say, in most of the films they have censored. The Board has passed films where a kiss is snatched hurriedly; where it has been of but a few seconds' duration; and where it has seemed to everyone, according to the Board, but the participating parties, an eternity. But now the time has arrived where the long, lingering, everlasting kisses have to be cut out.

"It sets too bad an example for our young girls," explained one censor recently, when a caress was ordered sheared. And then rules other than we announced in a previous issue have been promulgated. Abbreviated skirts, dueling, and gambling by women, are some of the things tabooed. The Buckeye State's official O. K., which after November 4, is flashed onto every screen before each picture, has been designed by Secretary W. C. Archer, of the State Board of Administration. It is the map of Ohio in yellow with the bold words: "Passed by the Ohio State Board of Censorship."

These photoplaywrights and directors who would have their product shown in the green pastures and beside the still waters of Ohio state, will do well to eliminate the profuse kisses from script and film. We have been told that we came within an ace of landing on this board. A miss is as good as a mile, if the art of Cinematography is to be held up to ridicule on every opportunity in the press of Ohio by these censors.

Good Books

Man is known by the company he keeps. If he reads good books he is in the best of company. We read an article the other day in which an author boasted that he didn't read much. The character of his work proved that fact before he opened his mouth. Good books incite uplifting inspiration. With more solid reading on the part of photoplaywrights there will exit the neurotic plot, and the scenes with the dark brown taste. We need more optimism, more sunshine, more moral lessons in the pictures, and less suggestion, ballroom flirtation and deathbed scenes. Tell us what you read and we will tell you what you are.

Pertinent Pointers

Editor Ben Schulberg, of Famous Players Film Company, will consider select multiple reel plots. Stories must be exceptionally good.

Edison says: "No man knows one seven-billionth of one per cent of anything;" but many a photoplaywright gets mad if the Editor tells him the story is not available.

Many a young writer has lost a good sale by telling the Editor if he could not give attention to his manuscript immediately to send it back to him. Scripts that look favorable are frequently kept for more careful examination.

It is from the unexpected quarter that the exceptionally good script may come at any time, and every good editor knows this and refuses to close doors to the unknown writers, or the unsolicited story.

If one waited until he was in the exact mood to write, he might wait forever. A system of good hard work for an hour or two daily will accomplish a great deal. Creating a story is hard work and this "inspirational" talk is mostly rot.

A correspondent tells us that he enclosed picture post cards with his script and sold the story because the Editor and Director received helpful ideas of scenic environment. We have known picture post cards to suggest more than one good story but we do not advise deluging the defenseless editor with pictures of Niagara Falls and "Wish you were here" written thereon.

Do not write a letter to the Editor stating "This story is founded upon facts," or "This is a true story taken from real life." The amateur does this and it prejudices the script reader against the story. Truth is seldom stranger than fiction despite popular argument to the contrary. Submit your story and your name and address and rest content.

This is the season of the year to write plots with interior scenes for Eastern companies.

Endeavor to choose titles that are not commonplace. Work as hard on the question of your script titles as on the script action. Try and arrive at a title that will cause immediate interest.

Next Week's Feature

Next week, Miss Maibelle Heikes Justice will inform you just how she writes those gripping multiple reel features that have made her work so much sought for. Miss Justice is equally at home in Filmland and Fictionville.

Shown Without Titles

After being inflicted with windy arguments that the more sub-titles to a picture, the better for the picture, we viewed "The Anarchist," a King Baggott feature. It was produced by Herbert Brenon. Heart interest is established at the very beginning (this is worthy of especial note) and the picture was shown without titles; none was needed.

A New Scheme

The very newest idea is from the New York genius who has had just a few photoplays returned to him because they are better adapted to short stories. He is willing to sell the plots at so much per plot, to short story writers.

Knowing Where To Sell

Half the game of Authorship is knowing where to sell. Yes, half. It is just like any other business venture. The man who speculates in live stock studies the market, learns where the best prices are offered, and whether hogs, cattle, or sheep are in demand. The writer of fiction studies his market also. He discovers that the Cosmopolitan Magazine does not desire the kind of story that might please the Western Christian Advocate. He knows stuff demanded by the Railroad Man's Magazine will be disdained by The Smart Set. The experienced photoplay writer had learned through costly experience that Thanhouser is not buying that scripts written for Biograph are so readily adaptable elsewhere; that Reliance is not in the market for the stories which prove highly desirable for Keystone comedy.

The experienced photoplaywright constantly studies his markets. Like the dealer in livestock he makes it his business to know the sudden shifts in the market; where the best prices are obtainable; the easiest shipping point. There is too much of the hit or miss policy pursued by the beginner—and by others. Keeping in close touch with the trade publications; a careful study of their advertising columns; and intelligent work are indispensable items for those who would succeed. Try and determine the place wherein your plot will fill a need. Submit your story to the Editor of that company which calls for the kind of manuscript you have to sell. Do not "fire at random" hoping that your plot will land somewhere.

If your story is rejected, repeat the process. Look for errors that you may not have noticed previously. It is a good plan to keep a completed script by you for several weeks before sending it out. Let it "get cold" and then read it over again carefully. Maybe you will conclude to give it a final recopying.

The Hall of Fame

Marie Corelli is writing 'em!

J. M. Barrie is not writing picture plays despite the fact that a New York Editor recently bought a script that later turned out to be a Barrie play.

Miss Hettie Gray Baker is in Los Angeles, Calif., this Winter. She is adapting the Jack London novels to the motion picture screen.

Eustace Hale Ball and Lawrence McGill wrote the screen dramatization of "Checkers."

Orville Harrold, American opera tenor, claims authorship to fifty motion picture plays.

The "Sample" Script

The "sample" script, in our estimation, does the beginner more harm than good and that is a reason we do not utilize it in our work. After all, it is the idea and the originality, and not the form, that is all-important. We know of a number of writers who have achieved unusual success without studying a "form" play; and we know of others who have followed the "sample" script almost word for word and, consequently, have been delayed in progressing.

A script written by Editor McCloskey, of Lubinville, was recently published. It was not intended as a model when written, and consequently some studio slang was written in. Yesterday we read a script the author of which had carefully utilized all the expressions in the McCloskey manuscript. McCloskey wrote that script in a hurry, probably, and used the colloquialisms to save time. The freelance writer is differently situated and cannot write in slang with impunity. Don't do it.

Just a Reminder

The biggest and best producers in the world are those releasing clean photoplays. Pictures that appeal to the entire people, mean decent pictures. Keep your own self-respect, and try and win the respect of others, by writing only the sort of stories that you would like your mother to see.

Much Ado About Nothing

The chatter being circulated in that portion of the theatrical press antagonistic to the motion pictures, that "an exposé of scenario departments is coming via the damage suit route," is pure piffle. Reputable concerns have nothing to fear, and contributors have nothing to fear, either. The time is passing when the idea can be gleesomely filched, and your script is as safe in the hands of a Scenario Editor as it is elsewhere. Will this "plot stealing howl" never down?

Just a Couple

Vitagraph Company editorial department states that until further notice all dramatic or melodramatic plots must consist of two, three or four reels.

Pilot Film Company is not in the market at present for plots.

Detective Stories

A photoplaywright who has contracted the "detective script fever," wishes to know where he can secure "high-class ideas" of such plots. After a brief statement that the detective story is no easy story to produce on the picture screen, and that we have had too many as it is, we rise to remark that every detective plot in the last fifty years has been more or less a steal from Edgar Allen Poe. Doyle, Leblanc, Futrelle, and the rest of the analytical plotters are followers in the footsteps of Poe. Sherlock Holmes, "The Thinking Machine," and Arsene Lupin but develop Poe's original reasoning. For ingenuity of plot, we think Wilkie Collins developed an original field. His "Moonstone" and "Woman in White" will repay you for the time spent in reading them. We recommend a study of Collins' methods to any would-be writer of detective plots.

ECLAIR COMPANY AT LAKE GEORGE

The residents of Lake George, N. Y., recently were somewhat startled to meet the beautiful, quaintly gowned young women and handsome young men, garbed in costumes of bold sir knights and the scarlet coated uniforms of the English army in Colonial days.

The strangers were members of the Eclair Film Company, of Fort Lee, N. J., who chose the scenic surroundings of Lake George as a historic stage setting for several scenarios English and Colonial in character.

The members taking part in these dramas are: O. A. C. Lund, Miss Barbara Tennant, Miss Julia Stewart, Miss Rosa Koch and Edward F. Roseman, Lindsay J. Hall, James G. Davis, Gene Hornbostl, Charles Hunt and George Cowl.

KEEPING 'EM BUSY

Three factories are now busy making prints of Pasquali's "Last Days of Pompeii," in an effort to keep abreast with the demand from the road companies and house managers.

Stanley H. Twist, who is in charge, has been working every night for the past two weeks. In fact, the whole office force has been working overtime, and most of the members are beginning to show signs of wear and tear.

LATEST NEWS FROM CHICAGO

St. Louis Home of New Film

A NEW brand of film will soon be put out by the Laclede Film Corporation with factory headquarters at St. Louis. It is also the intention of this concern to maintain offices in both New York City and Chicago. The brand name of the product of this new company will be Dacotah, this is the old Indian way of spelling Dakota. The reason of the selection of this name is to get something that is typically Western and Indian

It is the intention of the Laclede corporation to release a three-reel subject twice a month from the very start. These films it is stated already have an assured market. The Exclusive Supply Corporation will soon make this brand a part of its program. If the demand already made for this brand is in even greater part adhered to, then the company states that they will soon commence the release of multiple-reel subjects every week.

This company is backed by several capitalists. Joseph Hopp, former owner of the Standard Film Exchange, of Chicago and Louisville, has been asked to accept the presidency of the company, and he states that he is inclined to do so. A. J. Lindsay, a well-known capitalist and business man, of St. Louis, will be treasurer. The company is now planning the building of a large glass studio on the outskirts of St. Louis. It is said that several other cities have bid for the factory.

William Hopp Seriously Ill

William Hopp, brother to Joseph Hopp, and manager of the Standard Film Exchange of Chicago, branch of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, was taken suddenly ill at his home recently. Physicians were hastily summoned, and he was at once conveyed to the St Joseph hospital. Mr. Hopp had a violent hemorrhage, and after the use of serum the flow of blood was stopped. Owing to his weakened condition they found it necessary to build him up before they could put him under the knife. His case is diagnosed as an ulcer near the stomach. An X-ray picture was made of his body in order to locate the exact spot of his trouble, and the attending surgeons announced that the surgical operations would take place on Thursday, November 13.

The physicians stated that they were confident that with the care and treatment he is receiving that they will have him on the street again in about four weeks. His condition has been so alarming that Joseph Hopp. who was scheduled to be in New York last week, postponed his trip.

Union Film Company Moves

The Union Film Company which at the present time has offices in the Dapples building, on December first will occupy the quarters formerly used by the Mutual Film Corporation on the mezzanine floor of the Morton building. Although this concern has been in operation only five weeks, it has rapidly outgrown its quarters. W. F. Wreden, manager of this company, made a happy choice in the selection of his new offices, as they are ideally located, splendidly furnished and easily accessible from all parts of the city.

Magie Returns from Portland

George Magie, district manager of all territory west of Pittsburg for the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, returned to Chicago this week from Portland, Ore., and other Western cities where he has been spending the past few weeks on business for his company.

Exchangemen Discuss Chicago Censorship

Because of the many films killed by the Chicago censor board within the past few weeks. a conference was held on Saturday, November 8, which was attended by exchangemen and manufacturers' representatives. The feature and buying exchanges were represented in this meeting

At this gathering actions were agreed upon which are hoped to be protective in their nature. It was determined to secure counsel, whose duty it will be to correct the radical censorship that is now being made on film, and also to stop the operation of the fifty-cent tax that is placed on each reel for censor permit. Another meeting is to be held some time this week.

It was decided to retain as counsel Henry J. Toner and David K. Toner. Both of these men are prominent members of the bar.

A LITTLE encouragement goes a long way to improve the service. The trouble with too many managers, in fact, with most of the business men, is that while they are ready to make a good deal of fuss at the least mistake on the part of an employee, they fail to appreciate a good service and never think to give this word of praise which means so much and which is an encouragement to do still better in the future.

Just as machines need oil to work smoothly, so men need a little encouragement once in a while to stimulate their ambition. Otherwise they lose not only ambition but all interest in their work if their efforts are not recognized.

Speaking of Praise

We think more of animals than we do of our fellowmen. If an employee, full of ambition to do his best to help the owner, does some extra work, or is intelligent enough to meet an emergency and save much trouble and money to the firm, his work is not praised because the owner has an idea that such extra work is included in the meagre salary. On the other hand, if the owner's dog does a good act, he is petted and encouraged.

The sound effects were so correct and so well timed at the New Grand Central Theatre of St. Louis, that Fred. Soistmann and myself deemed it our duty to congratulate the manager. Our ambition was to shake hands with so able a sound effect man, but as we could not walk to the orchestra pit without an introduction, and as the manager did not volunteer to accompany us, we had to walk out without a chance to express our appreciation to the man who can give such life to the picture.

If we were disappointed in our efforts to encourage the good work, I can say that the management has lost a chance to improve the work, as there is no doubt in my mind that the drummer would have been pleased to receive us, and our praises on his excellent work would have encouraged him to try to improve still further.

All these little things, no matter how insignificant they may seem, are of the greatest importance in the successful management of a first-class theatre.

It is out of place in a motion picture house charging twenty cents and twenty-five cents admission, to see the manager chewing on a cigar butt and to see the ushers answer the patrons with their hands in their trousers pockets.

In a house charging a high admission, able to keep a full orchestra and have an expensive pipe organ, the management should be able to furnish a complete uniform and not a coat only. As young ushers are tempted to follow the fashions, their fancy trousers, narrow at the bottom and turned up, are not of the military style and do not harmonize with the uniform coat.

Hands and the Pockets

The manager of a certain theatre told me

"It is a deplorable habit, not to say disrespectful to the patrons of a theatre, for the ushers to answer them with their hands in the pockets."

To overcome this ungentlemanly manner on the part of the ushers and to force them to keep their hands out of their pockets, this manager has all the uniform trousers made without side pockets and only a small hip pocket for the handkerchief. The manager is much pleased with his experiment and claims that the attendants cannot put their hands in their pockets and they do not spoil the appearance of the uniform with pockets bulging out from carrying pipes and many other articles not required by the usher while on duty.

SCENE FROM "THE SERPENT IN EDEN"
Eclair Hand-Colored Drama in Two Acts

The white military collar should be furnished with the uniform; in fact, it should be part of the uniform. Few ushers have any knowledge of the military style, and to show a fancy necktie they wear a fashionable collar and keep the uniform coat open—a mark of great carelessness.

It would be well for most of our attendants of motion picture theatres and for many managers themselves, to watch the soldiers of Uncle Sam, as they would see that many of the fads of our young dudes are not the proper style for men whose duties are to serve the public. Cuffs on trousers may be a high degree of fashion but they are not allowed in the army—and not even on our most efficient railroads.

I was much pleased to find at the new Kozy Theatre on Clark street, Chicago, some correctly uniformed ushers. The uniforms are very neat; nothing gaudy or flashy, and the men wear white standing collars with the coat buttoned, no cuffs on the trousers nor hands in the pockets.

Here again I may say that, if we have so many careless attendants, it is due to the fact that the manager does not encourage his men to be neat and clean. The young American who has a poor conception of the word "liberty" and who believes that the uniform is a sign of slavery, hates to be uniformed, and his natural dislike grows stronger if he is made an object of curiosity by either a gaudy or a poorly made uniform. On the other hand, if the uniform is neat, well made, and if the wearer is complimented on his fine appearance, he will take a pride in his uniform.

Indifference Is Harmful

The indifference of a manager is sufficient to discourage the best intentioned employee.

As stated at the beginning of this article, a little judicious praise can accomplish wonders, as men are not different from women in that they like to be flattered.

I feel confident that Charles McNulty, of the Colonial Theatre, Norwich, Conn., has been fully repaid for his courtesy when he introduced me to C. A. Dowsett, his pianist, as the few words I exchanged with this musician proved to him that some persons could enjoy his clever playing of the picture.

I remember how the attendants of the Hippodrome, of Lancaster, Pa., were thankful when I complimented the manager on the neat appearance and good manners of his employees.

The good will of any worker must be sustained by some occasional encouragement. The trouble is that most of the employers have the wrong idea that a word of praise makes the man selfish. Yes, too much praise may induce the employee to believe that he is indispensable, but a judicious encouragement can do no harm. J. M. B.

SPECIAL FILM REVIEWS

THE Lure of New York. New York Film Co.—A story of the trials and tribulations of a strange girl when alone in New York. Regina, a Bavarian girl, comes to New York to seek her fortune. On the way over she meets another woman who promises to introduce her in New York and take care of her. She is a procurer and deceives the simple girl. After a series of adventures some of them most startling, she escapes, and is adopted by a wealthy woman who makes "a lady" of her. She then meets her mother again in a novel way. There are some excellent city street scenes introduced. The photography is excellent throughout. The escape on the elevated railroad and the drop from one of the pillars to the street was most dramatic. A drama that should make a name for itself among the lovers of melodrama. Miss Jennie Goldstein, of the Max Gabel theatre in New York, plays the lead and shows herself capable of great emotion.

The Life of St. Patrick. Four-Reel Feature.—Mr. Benedict, who is offering this picture for State Rights buyers, is to be congratulated on having secured a unique picture—unique in theme, treatment and opportunity.

In the last regard, it is bound to be a difficult and expensive thing for anybody else wanting to make a life of St. Patrick to exactly traverse the ground gone over by Mr. Walsh, which must necessarily be done, with any hope of excelling this picture. For the Irish scenes are the historic scenes in the life of the Saint whilst the archæology seems to us, as laymen, to be attended to with flawless accuracy. The writer is a Catholic and from what he has been taught about Ireland's apostle this pictorial review of his life seems to be a reasonable one, according to history, tradition and legend.

There are some pretty bits of scenery in this film and the narrative is kept steadily in view in every foot. The film play is full of action from the time when the infant Patrick is seen at his mother's knee learning the rudiments of Christianity up to the hour when he dies, a venerated saint, and is solemnly buried.

As a child he tries to convert the pagan. As a lad he suffers amongst the heathens living in Ireland in the fourth century. Later he returns and miraculously converts them. Modern physicists may scoff at the feasibility of his miracles, but they are part of Catholic belief, though not necessarily of Catholic dogma.

You even see the saint being somewhat rough on one solitary snake that interposes itself in the picture. There were lots of snakes in the original negative, but according to our information, an Irish Bishop advised that most of the snakes be cut out, otherwise the picture might look ridiculous.

This is a beautiful, convincing, well acted story about the Apostle of Ireland. It is reverently and artistically treated and would be welcome in any motion picture theatre, or church, school, lecture or entertainment hall, where good pictures are welcome.

The photography is in parts splendid and always good, and the acting always natural. It is an unstagy presentation, well produced. Nothing in it is overdone. While it should and probably will please Catholics, it cannot offend or displease non-Catholics; on the contrary, it will interest all. Let's hope that this film will have a long career.

It will be well, we think, to give the reader the synopsis of the story of Patrick's life as outlined in the film. The incidents treated occurred in the fourth and fifth centuries and as may be supposed, original authorities have been quoted for the purpose of verifying the archeology of the subject. There is not so far as we can discover a single anachronism in it. Objection was taken to the apparent modernity of a prayer book held by the Saint. We write "apparent" deliberately: illuminated missals and other religious books were in existence over a thousand years ago, long before the invention of printing:

The Traffic in Souls. Imp. Seven Parts.—A few years ago such a picture as this would have been impossible. During the past season there were many "vice" plays produced in New York and the public have become educated to the belief that they are eye-openers. The subject, still a tender one, is dealt with so reverently by the Imp caste that even the members of the National Board of Censorship could not find fault. In fact, they even praised its probable consequence.

Isaac Baring, an aged inventor, has two pretty daughters, Jane and Lorna. The latter is a feather-brained little girl who is spirited away from her work one evening, drugged and taken to a strange house and locked in a room. Officer 4434, is Jane's sweetheart and commences an active search for his prospective sister-in-law when he is told she has gone off with this man. Jane is discharged from her work because of the disgrace of her sister. She is given work in the office of "the man higher up" and it is here that she learns her sister's "prison." With Matt, her policeman fiance, she has the house raided and her sister returns to her home.

Scenes from the raiding of other houses are shown, and many of the methods of the "cadets" in getting girls are demonstrated, thus telling vividly the things to beware of. The aged father's new invention plays a big part in the final capturing of the gang. Miss Jane Gail, as the officer's sweetheart, played with her usual cleverness. Ethel Grandin as Lorna, was wonderful. The part suited her very well indeed. Matt Moore played the officer. Howard Crampton is the "go-between." William Cavanaugh and Irene Wallace completed the important roles.

Caprice. Famous Players. Four Reels.—Four delightful reels of comedy-drama, the variations of pathos and light comedy being of great frequency. Mary Pickford, who needs no introduction, plays the part of Mercy Baxter, originally created for Mrs. Fiske and played by her for one of her most successful seasons. Miss Pickford could not have obtained a more desirable vehicle. She is ably supported by Owen Moore, Ernest Truax, Ogden Crane and James Gordon.

Jack Henderson, a society man having wearied of the monotonous life he has been leading, goes into the woods for a hunting trip and meets Mercy Baxter. They become interested in one another. Mercy is a will-o'-the-wisp sort of a person, never serious, though always meaning well. Miss Pickford portrays this well, perhaps too well. Jack's father forbids the marriage but they are nevertheless wed, and build their own home. Mercy tries to become educated but fails, and after a time Jack becomes ashamed of her illiteracy and finally forces her to leave him. She goes away. Her father places her in a school under an assumed name where she becomes the roommate of her sister-in-law. She soon has the rough edges rubbed off and before long is an accomplished "lady." Jack returning from Europe meets his sister's chum and falls in love with her, not being sure that she is his own wife. She owns up later and they are reunited, his father taking him back.

The action throughout is light and breezy, never causing the attention to lag and should meet with a high degree of success. The fire scene in the school deserves especial mention for its good direction.

The Diver. Vitagraph. Two parts. (Nov. 8.)—Featuring Mlle. Ideal in the part of a diver. A clever story is woven around her ability as a swimmer and aquatic performer, and is a worthy release.

The story is about the jealousy of a woman, and the malicious plans she uses when she sees that she cannot obtain what she desires by fair play. John Hawley (Earle Williams) thinks a great deal of "Ideal," the diver, and has asked her to be his wife. She consents and all is happy until Rita hears of it. By letting Hawley find some flowers in his fiancee's room with a man's handkerchief, he becomes jealous. He watches her, in response to an anonymous letter, and sees his rival apparently stealing from her house at the dead of night.

"Ideal" saves the life of a little girl in the Niagara River later, and when Hawley hears of this he goes to her immediately. He receives a telegram from Rita telling him of her duplicity and all is well.

The scene in the river is especially well directed and deserves praise. Rose Tapley plays the part of Rita.

The Fatal Plunge. Eclectic. Three Reels. (Nov. 13.)—A good release embodying plenty of excitement.

Count Durant (what would a French release be without a Count?) is desperately hard up and surrounded by creditors. He proposes marriage to the daughter of a wealthy automobile manufacturer and is accepted. He then plots, with the help of his scheming sister, to obtain the money of his wife. Her father, feeling he has not much longer to live, leaves the business in the hands of his private secretary who loves Edith. The Count failing in this method, and having been disinherited by his father-in-law, insures his wife's life, intending to kill her. This is attempted with dynamite at a fox hunt, but is frustrated by the secretary. It is again attempted on an automobile trip, but again the friend discovers the plot. A boy having been offended by the Count hurls a stone at him while he is driving his car and causes him to lose control and pitch into the river over a bank. He is of course killed. Plenty of action!

It is rather good to see a copy of Leslie's Weekly in the hands of one of the characters when everything else is so very French.

The Serpent in Eden. Eclair. Two reels. (Dec. 17.)—One of the most beautifully hand-colored pictures it has been our fortune to see in a long time. Several scenes appear to be familiar to us, as though we had seen them before. Perhaps, however, it is only a similarity. The story deals with a young artist who marries a girl while he is in the depths of despair, not being able to sell any of his productions. When at last, however, success seems to be his, and the money is coming in every mail, he tires of his faithful wife and becomes enamoured of an actress. She, later tiring of him, leaves him, and Denise, his heartbroken wife, returns to her father. A reconciliation is finally brought about between the husband and wife. The action is not allowed to drag for a moment.

Eighty Million Women Want ——? Unique. Four Parts.—Although Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst, the eminent English militant, and Mrs. Harriet Stanton Blatch, President of the Women's Political Union, with numerous other believers in and workers for suffrage, have parts in this new production, the play itself is not an advertisement of the votes-for-women movement. The plot is fresh and interesting and the photography is good. The cast is very clever and deserves commendation.

MRS. PANKHURST AS SHE APPEARS IN THE PICTURE

The story very ably "shows up" the modern system of machine politics, the remedy suggested being suffrage. The corruption of a judge while he is on the bench is one of the stirring scenes, and brings vividly to our minds the recent exposures in the Empire State.

The story starts with a young lawyer who, loving a girl, wishes to marry her. His first case, that of an automobile accident, is lost because the political boss wants to ruin the boy for having refused to go crooked. He yields finally, however, and becomes a crook. The girl, hearing of this, joins the suffrage party. By clever detective work she and her colleagues gain sufficient evidence to obtain a warrant against the Boss and he is arrested. The two are joined together again, and she seems happier by far over the marriage license than she was over the party badge she had worn. The word "had" is used advisedly.

Mrs. Pankhurst as an actress was very conscious, but did as well as might be expected of a woman of her age. Mrs. Blatch seemed to pose a little.

The scenario was written by Mrs. Cooley, needless to add a member of the Women's Political Union.

American Born. American.—One incident and one situation after the other has been piled into this two-reel American production, which will be released on December 1st. There is enough material in the story of this picture to make three reels. However, as it now stands, one's interest is always maintained, and only that which is absolutely necessary for the telling of the story is used. The story carries one from the far Western States of America to the innermost circles of London's society. The appeal of the picture is wide, its acting is convincing, and its story is interesting.

The beautiful scenery that lies in and about Santa Barbara, Cal., is put to good service, the picturesque views of the looming mountains and beautiful backgrounds lend added value to the picture.

The opening scenes of the picture show the dying mother telling her only child, an orphan, of the wealth and power of her family and of her royal blood. Dorothy Danvers has always been of the opinion that her parents are of lowly birth, until the dying words of her mother apprise her of her noble relatives living in England and the large estates she has inherited. With the assistance of the honest old Indian servant, Dorothy, known in America as Pepita, goes to Europe to see for the first time her relatives.

In the House of Danvers she first

WHEN Mr. Talbot, of St. Louis, built his 3,000-seat Hippodrome, with a show of two and a half hours for ten cents, the general opinion was that the Grand Central Theatre of Mr. Sievers, on the opposite corner, would go out of existence.

The rumor had a foundation, as it seemed hopeless for Mr. Sievers to try to keep open with pictures only, at the same admission of ten cents. In other words, the current opinion was that a long program of several vaudeville acts with pictures sandwiched between them would draw all the patronage of the neighborhood.

Hippodrome Like a Circus

The Hippodrome was an immense success. It was a novelty. Everyone from the four corners of St. Louis and from the numerous surrounding towns and villages, wanted to see the new Hippodrome.

But—there is always a but—the Hippodrome, while a great attraction, is not the habitual rendezvous of the real lovers of motion pictures and of good plays. The Hippodrome is like a circus. The seats are narrow and uncomfortable, many attendants in gold laces, floods of lights from thousands of lamps of different colors, a full noisy orchestra, and peanut shells on the floor. It is a splendid show, like a show at P. T. Barnum's—a show to see once but a show that does not call for a second visit. There is too much going on to enjoy any special act. Everything, even the pictures, has to be hurried to make time and room for the waiting crowds. It is an excellent circus show.

Did Mr. Sievers suffer? No. After two years of existence, the Hippodrome has failed to stop the daily flow of lovers of motion pictures at the Grand Central Theatre, and Mr. Sievers has suffered so little from the competition of the Hippodrome that he has been able to build a new big motion picture palace called the New Grand Central on Grand avenue, St. Louis, which he runs in connection with the old Grand Central of Sixth and Market streets.

There is a reason for the great success of Mr. Sievers, and this reason is very simple. Mr. Sievers knows how to put on a good picture. He is master in the art of appropriate music and he is an experienced manager, who knows that appearance and manners are essential to the success of a theatre.

Mr. Sievers' Success

In passing, I must state that in a certain sense I regret the wonderful success of Mr. Sievers, as prosperity has induced him to devote much of his time on another line of business and abandon his theatres to local managers. While the old policy is still in existence, and most of the old employees trained by Mr. Sievers are still in the place, it is easy for an observer to see that the eye of the master is not there all the time.

The success of Mr. Sievers proves that we have enough lovers of motion pictures to patronize our first-class photoplay houses, and who do not call for long programs, sensational posters nor noisy music.

The success of Mr. Sievers is due to his excellent projection and to his wonderful sound effects, in which he is a master as great as Mr. Lyman Howe. The sound effects are not only correct but they are properly timed.

His wave effects proved to me that his drummer was very attentive and was watching every motion on the screen. When the waves would form and roll at a distance, we would hear nothing, but as they would increase in size and near the beach, we could hear this sort of a deep rolling sound, then a splash when they would break.

The following scene was a masterpiece of work on the part of the orchestra, and showed how musicians could enhance the beauty of a picture. A Selig production.

A high rock in the ocean. A man is seen climbing the rock, most likely a dreamer who wants to admire the rolling waves from a high perch. A rowboat appears. It is drifting away. Its only occupant is a frightened little girl. There is a deep suspense on the part of the audience, a sort of chill. It looks as if the rowboat is going to crash into the rock and send to the bottom of the ocean the beautiful little girl. At the same time the eye is riveted on the dreamer at the top of the rock as he is preparing to dive to save the child. Is he going to dive? Is it not very dangerous, not to say a sure death, to dive from such a height at such a place?

This scene holds the audience in a deep suspense. Women are ready to scream and to cry, men are affected. On Broadway, New York, the full orchestra would play a lively waltz or march during such a pathetic scene, or would have the audience to whistle a popular ragtime tune. Mr. Sievers' musicians know better. They stop the music. The silence in the orchestra pit respects the agony of the audience. All that we can hear is the waves breaking against the rock, emphasizing the peril of the child. The man dives and as his body strikes the water, we hear the splash, followed by another silence, until the man reappears on the surface and rescues the little girl before the frail boat crashes into the rock. Then the orchestra starts on a soft, plaintive tune until the man brings the child to the witnesses of the rescue, where there is then joy on the screen and in the orchestra pit.

This is the way to make the picture talk, and when the musicians can express the true sentiments they nail the attention of the audience.

I was so delighted with the sound effects of Mr. Sievers that when I met Fred Soistmann, Jr., of Camden, N. J., the demonstrator of the Dramagraph Sound Effect Cabinet, I invited him to visit the New Grand Central Theatre. While I claim to be a fair judge of sound effects, I was delighted at the real enjoyment of Mr. Soistmann, who is a past expert in the art of producing sound effects for the picture.

It would be too long to enumerate all the effects, but I can state that they were the best I have heard for a long time. The drummer of Mr. Sievers does not believe that he must make a noise all the time to show that he is on the job, and he does not keep his foot pressing on the pedal of his bass drum and cymbals from the first to the last scene of a picture.

Mr. Sievers does not give a long program at his New Grand Central, but he packs his new house at twenty cents and twenty-five cents on his reputation of showing the best pictures and of showing them properly.

If many of our friends would consult Mr. Sievers, they would not fear unfair competition, as they would realize that lovers of motion pictures do not call for sensational posters, long programs, nor noisy music. The patrons want the quality and they will pay the admission to see a picture projected properly and accompanied with appropriate music.

Various Sound Effects

I had the pleasure to hear the first Bartola Orchestra installed in the loop district of Chicago at the new Kozy Theatre on Clark street. It is very complete in effects, and as I have stated in a previous letter, the Bartola, like the Wurlitzer Unit Orchestra, the Dramagraph, the Deagan Bells, must be in the hands of a competent musician who can read and understand the picture and control the music accordingly.

The Deagan Bells are still in great favor; they are, in fact, a great attraction. While Mr. J. C. Deagan is busy on a number of new musical instruments, his factory is working overtime on his electric bells.

Pathe to Film Exposition

Motion Pictures to Tell World of Doings in San Francisco Over the Panama Canal

AN important and interesting contract has just been closed between the Pathe people and the directors of the Panama-Pacific International Exposition. It involves the exploitation of the wonderful progress being made on the exposition grounds where buildings are rising so rapidly that even motion picture machines have difficulty in synchronizing, and it gives to the Pathe people a right to take motion pictures throughout the nine months of the exposition that will prove of inestimable advantage to that organization and of untold interest and entertainment to thousands of motion picture patrons all over the world whose only glimpses of the exposition by the Golden Gate, interest in which is universal, will be obtained through the medium of these pictures.

Already the Pathe people have their hands full keeping apace with the progress of work at the exposition. The present activity of 5,000 men on the grounds will be increased to 10,000 men, it is expected, when the highest point of construction energy is reached.

The main group of exhibit palaces, comprising the palaces of Education, Liberal Arts, Manufactures, Varied Industries, Mines, Transportation, Agriculture and Food Products, is rising majestically from a chaos of lumber and steel and will be completed fully eight months in advance of the opening of the exposition which is to celebrate the completion of the Panama Canal.

Military pageants are of frequent occurrence, the last having been held in honor of the state of Kansas, which has just selected and accepted at the hands of President C. C. Moore, for the exposition, its site for a state building. Green sward is spreading itself quietly in the spaces reserved for horticultural display, and within the limits of the 635 acres constituting the area of the exposition grounds there is to be found material of bewildering variety and great interest for the vigilant eye of the motion picture camera.

SKETCH ARTIST FOR POSTERS

"Show us the lithographs" has become of such significance in the sale of state right features that the Film Releases of America has engaged George McEvoy, a sketch artist of wide reputation and recognized ability, to draw all sketches for its posters. McEvoy's work is powerful in sturdy lines and delicate shadings of intelligence enables him to catch the conception and consummate it artistically.

The first of McEvoy's work will be seen on the lithographs for "The Secret of Adrianople," the interesting three-reel subject which follows "Outlawed."

SYDNEY AYRES—AMERICAN ACTOR

Sydney Ayres, leading man of the 'Flying A" company, bears his laurels well. His record on the legitimate stage has been most enviable for his years. His first experience dates back to the time when Little Lord Fauntleroy was famous in America. He was one of the original four boys to play this part.

He has been associated as leading man with such celebrities as E. H. Sothern and Otis Skinner. He played the part of the original clansman in Thomas Dickson's problem play, "The Clansman." For Wilton Lackaye, in Hall Caine's "The Bondsman," he played lead, and has been identified as a star with almost all principal stock companies in America.

His experience in moving pictures dates back several years. He played the leads in the "101 Bison" features produced by the New York Motion Picture Company. Later he served with success in the Selig and Edison companies.

He will play the lead in "Flying A" subjects. "The Occult," "American Born," a two-part feature, also "The Moth and the Flame," are subjects that give him splendid opportunity to display his versatility.

Mr. Ayres is delighted with conditions and possibilities at Santa Barbara. The hospitality of the members of the various "Flying A" companies, as also that of the populace at large, has made a marked impression on him, while on the other hand his short stay has already won for him the highest regard of his associates.

Gaumont's two new reels, released Saturday, have proved a great success, so much so that they are faced with the problem of building a larger factory at Flushing, L. I., or to stop doing work for other film houses, as already they have a day and night staff constantly at work.

ILLUSTRATION No. 1 shows the facade of the New Grand Central Theatre of Mr. Sievers, of St. Louis.

There is nothing of special note in this facade. It is very plain, yet imposing. At night the effect is good, with the lighted marquise extending over the sidewalk, and the three electric light devices, one on the pinnacle of the roof with the two others on both corners of the roof.

Entrance Conveys Impression

If the exterior of the building does not say much, the splendor of the entrance is sufficient to convey the impression that the most refined show is given within its doors.

Illustration No. 2 shows one corner of the lobby, the corner to the entrance door. The floor is of a decorated mosaic, the walls are all of fancy white marble with numerous great plate mirrors encased in fine mouldings.

Illustration No. 3 shows the floor plan of the lobby

AA is the lobby proper.

BB is the foyer.

CC is the auditorium.

D is the operating booth.

E is a ticket office for ten-cent admission.

F is a ticket office for twenty-cent and twenty-five cent tickets.

G is the entrance door to the auditorium.

H is the exit door.

Few theatres have two ticket offices but Mr. Sievers does not consider the wages of an extra ticket seller when the comfort of his patrons is to be considered.

The reserved boxes are twenty-five cents, the lower floor and the front part of the balcony are twenty cents, while the rear seats of the balcony are ten cents. While these ten-cent seats are not very desirable, they are sought by families of less means who are anxious to see a good show.

The object of two ticket offices is to try to keep the cheaper element from crowding the finely dressed ladies purchasing tickets. In fact, why not have two ticket booths in a motion picture theatre when opera houses have more than one ticket seller?

If money is not lavished on the facade of the New Grand Central Theatre, the beautiful lobby with its two elegant marble ticket booths, divided by an immense plate mirror in front of which are arranged a number of potted plants, conveys the impression that this theatre is the refined amusement place of the neighborhood.

NEW GRAND CENTRAL THEATRE

Booth on Lower Floor

The architects, Messrs. Helfenstelle, Hirsch & Watson, of St. Louis, had a very happy thought when they decided to use the space between the two ticket offices for the operating booth, instead of placing it, as is generally the case, at the top of the balcony. By this arrangement, Mr. Sievers has a perfectly direct throw and direct projection brings out the best results on the screen.

This is not the first operating booth I have found on the lower floor of a theatre, but it is, to my knowledge, the first to insure comfort and proper ventilation to the operators. This booth is high and commodious. At the top of the wall separating the booth from the lobby and just over the immense mirror located between the two ticket offices are a couple of windows opening on the lobby proper. These windows do not mar the appearance of the lobby, as they are screened behind some fancy grille work.

The foyer is very simple in decorations but of the highest taste, with all its hard woodwork, subdued lights and carpets. The auditorium is beautiful in its simplicity and most comfortable. In plain words, the money has not been lavished in gingerbread decorations, to catch the eye, but in solid comfort.

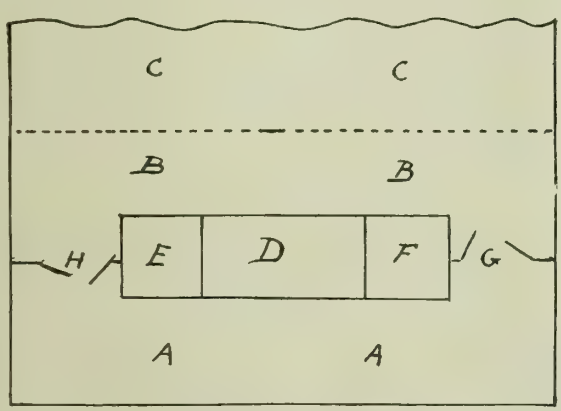
The New Grand Central Theatre is not an experiment. It is the fruit of experience gained by hard work. Mr Sievers is not a newcomer, he is one of the oldest exhibitors of St. Louis He made a success of his original Grand Central (the old one) on Sixth and Market streets. He is progressive, does not remain in his shell, but goes out to see what others are doing. Mr. Sievers is always willing to receive any advice, and he keeps posted on everything new pertaining to motion pictures.

St. Louis has some beautiful photoplay houses on which money has been lavished for the comfort of the patrons and the uplifting of the industry. The exhibitors of St. Louis do not believe in giving too much for the money, but they pride themselves to give the quality. Not only the film quality but the best projection, most appropriate music, and a clean, courteous service.

A Tip for New York

In the very near future, I will have the pleasure to publish a description of the ventilating system of the New Grand Theatre, from the pen of the architects. To-day I can repeat the statement of the manager, who claimed that during the hot days of last July, when the thermometer was 100 degrees in the shade, the temperature in the auditorium was below 80

A New Yorker, a frequent visitor at the Broadway motion picture theatres, was surprised to hear that some of the St. Louis exhibitors had the nerve to charge an admission of twenty cents and twenty-five cents for a four-reel show.



FLOOR PLAN OF LOBBY

If some of the Broadway theatres were to follow the St. Louis style, they could get the price, as New Yorkers, in general, are not slow to appreciate and support a good thing

EXCLUSIVE PROGRAM GROWS

The growth of the Exclusive Supply Corporation Program has necessitated the enlargement of the Exclusive Program, its weekly publication, from twelve to sixteen pages. This weekly makes no pretensions to being a newspaper or a trade journal, purposing only to convey sales facts and program notes to state right buyers and exchange-men.

WARNER'S IN CANADA

A. Warner, the busy vice-president of Warner's Features, Inc., no sooner returns to New York after an extended road trip than he packs his Gladstone and is off again to another part of the country. His present trip takes him to Montreal to open up an office there—the first link of a chain that will extend across the Dominion from coast to coast.

"THE THREE MUSKETEERS" FILMS

"The Three Musketeers," the famous story of Alexander Dumas, has been produced in film form by the Film Attractions Company, with offices at 145 West Forty-fifth street, New York City, and is now being put on the market.

It is a six-part production which took three months in the making. With it goes a liberal supply of "paper" and heralds. All the characters of the Dumas story are visualized on the screen, among them D'Artagnan, Athos and Porthos.

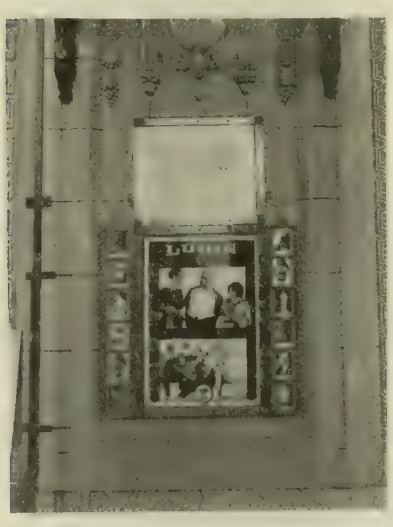
WHILE the cheap Western motion picture houses believe they cannot do business without a display of big posters, the better houses have a more refined taste and are very modest in their advertising display.

Poster frames (wood, brass, iron) are used more extensively than in the East. In fact, the Western exhibitors seem to have a more refined taste, seem to have a little more consideration for their patrons and for their neighbors. The selfish spirit of the East is scarcely known in the Middle West, where the business men, storekeepers and showmen unite to improve the appearance of their street.

At Mr. Sievers' New Grand Central Theatre, in St. Louis, I have found some new original brass frames of which I give the following illustration.



It is, as can be seen, a regular poster frame, on the sides of which are arranged a number of smaller frames for the photographs of the leading actors.

As the public takes such a deep interest in the leading actors and seems to judge a film more from the men and women taking part in it than from the trade-mark of the manufacturer, the exhibitor who exhibits the portraits of the favorite actors seems to draw a better patronage.

The man who is quick to grasp the fads of the public is the man who is sure to win at the end.

The manager of the General Specialty Company, of St. Louis, is a man who, while starting at the foot of the ladder, is making some quick money because he grasped the fad of the public for the photographs of the actors. As so many publishers are placing on the market photographs, portraits and post-cards of the men and women acting in motion picture plays, the manager of the General Specialty Company looked for something new and original. At last he struck an idea which proves a bonanza.

Transparent Players' Portraits

In front of the theatre, in the lobby, on the side walls of the auditorium, in the ceiling and in staircases, are many light fixtures with more or less shades. These shades are generally sort of petal-shaped windows with panes of glass of different colors, fancy glass, stained glass. The manager of the General Specialty Company came to the conclusion that these light fixtures could be made more attractive by replacing the panes of glass by some transparent portraits of the leading actors.

To this effect, he made shades of his own pattern in which the portraits can be inserted and changed daily, if necessary, without the least trouble.

It is useless to say that the General Specialty Company is swamped with orders, as these shades with the portraits of the leading actors are not only very attractive, but they hit the fad of the public and they can be obtained at a small cost.

In a previous issue of this paper, I said a few words on the announcement slides and expressed a wish to see the beautiful hand-colored slides return in favor and eclipse these cheap-looking stencil slides.

The following cut is an illustration of a very attractive and appropriate slide made by the American Slide Company, of Columbus, O.

While the design is good, the wording is still better

> Before saying "Good Night," we wish to thank you for your patronage.

It is clever and conveys a far better impression on the mind of the patrons than loud posters, as it shows a mark of appreciation and of deference. We all like the words, "Thank you." "Thank you" means good manners and good manners win all the time.

In the issue of The Motion Picture News of October 11th, I said and proved that the policy of the paper was to hunt the trade to find new things of direct interest to the exhibitor. Now, I have been fortunate to discover a new novelty which will make a good souvenir.

The novelty is a cardboard animal about three by five inches.

When the animal is laid on a table or any flat surface, it will, through a rubber band device, spring up and fall back right on its feet. It is a clever trick that does not only amuse the little ones, but interests the parents. On the reverse side of the painted animal is a good-sized space on which the name of the theatre or any other announcement can be printed.

This new novelty is placed on the market by Sam Alschuler, Schiller Building, Chicago.

These jumping animals will prove a great souvenir that will please the children and will be highly appreciated by the mothers.

For Women and Children

All the exhibitors know that the afternoon shows are mostly patronized by the women and children, and if you give one of these jumping animals to a child, the mother will not look at the small value of the article, but will be thankful at your kind attention in remembering her child, as any favor extended to a little one is always greatly appreciated by a fond mother.

Yes, it may be that by the same evening the child will have destroyed the toy, but nevertheless the mother will not forget your kind intention and will not only return to your theatre but praise your show to her neighbors. This is the kind of advertising you want.

You can offer coupons that are to be redeemed for valuable premiums, a sort of lottery that does you more harm than good, because the collectors of coupons always expect a better premium. As stated above, the mothers will not stop to consider the value of the jumping animals, but they will appreciate your kind intention to please the little ones.

The above suggestions will do you more good than sensational posters, as you are not in business for one day.

Highly sensational and vulgar posters can be the best advertising for a cheap one-day stand road show, a show looking to catch all the hayseeds the same day with no consideration for the morrow.

If to-day you make a sensational display, what will be the results? You will increase your gate receipts of to-day, there is no doubt of it. But to-morrow, what will you do?

Fakes Don't Go Twice

If you cannot secure more sensational posters for a week or two, your business will fall flat. You will be starving and the daily losses will foot up to a higher sum than the big receipts of to-day. If even you can secure enough posters to make a second and a third sensational display, your patrons will pass the place and say: "He caught us yesterday with his fake sensational show, but he will not get our money to-day."

Please your patrons. Extend to them all the courtesy you can. Make them feel at home, like a member of your own family, and they will be daily visitors. If your daily receipts do not amount to the gate receipts of a big sensational day, they will be more steady and leave you a better bank account. Do not kill the hen that lays the golden eggs. Do not try to get twenty eggs to-day and lose the three hundred and sixty-five golden eggs that the hen has in store for you during the year.

Chicago Ventilation Meeting Fruitless

ON Friday, November 7th, the ventilation committee of the International Motion Picture Association which consisted of the following men, Rob. Levy, B. L. Schwartz, L. Zaller, Charles Abrams and A. C. Krebs, gathered in the council chamber of the Chicago city hall where they produced experts to offer their opinion to the city's committee on ventilation.

Theodore Weinshank, an expert on ventilation, was the first to address the gathering. He pointed out that if a certain number of feet of air is required in some theatres it would be much more than needed to supply fresh air, while in other theatres the minimum would not be sufficient to keep the carbon dioxide below twelve parts to 10,000 parts of air. His suggestion was to change the ordinance to read a sufficient amount of air not to have more than twelve parts of carbon dioxide to 10,000 parts of air.

Mr. Weinshank's suggestion would make the ordinance even stronger, as he cited cases where it would require more than 15,000 feet per hour to make the theatre within the twelve parts of carbon dioxide.

Dr. Young, in cases of old theatres where it is practically impossible to put in a new system without tearing down the entire theatre, stated that these houses would be given consideration and an equitable arrangement arrived at. In the meantime, however, all action is suspended for several weeks until it is seen what action is taken by the city council. It is thought that within two weeks it will be decided one way or other.

A PIONEER PICTURE MAN

An interested visitor last week at the Selig Polyscope plant in Chicago was Jay Rial, who for a decade has represented the publicity interests of the Ringling Brothers, and for five years past has been at the head of the Barnum shows. Prior to going into the circus business, Mr. Rial, who was a manager in the theatrical business in his 'teens, made and lost several fortunes, picking up a quarter of a million on "Uncle Tom's Cabin," and was one of the earliest to take an English Opera Company through South America.

In 1904, Mr. Rial experienced some vicissitudes due to taking a large company to Australia, and, suffering from the troubles involved by a wicked partner, gave up his big show and started into the back country to bravely recoup his fortunes.

Out of the general wreckage he had rescued an Edison projecting machine that he had used for a ten minute diversion to close the big show. Early in June, he arrived with this one piece of apparatus at Newcastle, N. S. W, four hours' railway journey from Sydney. By dint of enterprise he had, by writing and canvassing to the colonies, secured four or five reels of pictures. The notable ones were a big railway robbery picture of American make, and a trick scenic picture of French descent showing a battle under the sea.

With these reels he managed to make an entire evening's program, and gave the first full program of pictures in the great South Sea continent.

He afterward secured a Gaumont projecting machine, and toured Australia, making money in the new venture.

He remarked that his assistants in the show, the boy who made the gas for the oxyhydrogen lamp and the other helper who turned the crank of the projecting machine, had since made fortunes in that field, and retired to enjoy it. Mr. Rial was more than astonished at the vast detail and perfected system he saw in the big Selig plant.

NEW YEAR RESOLUTIONS

(HE)

New Year resolutions flourish
Just about this time of year.
Not to chew so much tobacco,
Nor to drink a glass of beer.
Not to gamble, not to scatter
Smiles on girls along my way,
But there's one delight I'll cling to—
That's the motion picture play.

(SHE)

New Year resolutions always
Find me with an eager heart;
Now I'll keep my clothes in order,
Mending tears before they start.
Cut out sodas, spend less money
On my fashion fads, but stay—
I must have a cloak and bonnet
For the motion picture play.

(THEY)

New Year resolutions, surely
Everyone can find some need
For improvement in their living—
Change should be the rule and creed,
We'll reform and cut expenses,
Put that nest egg safe away.
Here's adieu to joy rides, dances—
Ours the motion picture play.

Educational—Industrial—Scenic—General

THE Hoodoo Umbrella. Vitagraph. (Nov. 5.)—A short comedy on the same reel with "Ancient Temples of Karnak." The story deals with an unruly umbrella of the "auto opening" variety, and some amusement is caused by the antics of Kate Price and Hughey Mack to get rid of it. Bert Angeles directed the picture in his usual excellent way.

Archie and the Bell Boy. Edison. (Nov. 5.)—Not up to the usual Edison standard. An effeminate boy, Archie, is frightened of everything, and gets into many scrapes. Bobs, a hotel bellboy, takes him in hand and administers fighting lessons to him, so that in a short time he is a "tough guy," or so imagines himself. The mother believes it to be a tonic Archie has been supposed to have been taking, but the truth comes out and the joyful father, on the "Q.T." enriches the bellboy.

The Return of Peter Blimm. Lubin. (Nov. 5.) General Film Co. Exclusive Service.—It need hardly be stated that this is a burlesque on "The Return of Peter Grimm," and a clever one also. Two old sailors are rivals for the hand of their landlady. One, Peter Blimm, goes swimming. When he does not return and his clothes are found he is believed dead. So when he does come back in a sheet to keep warm, the superstitious sailors all swear off drinking. All turns out well, though. Very cleverly acted.

The Man Who Vanished. Kalem. Two reels. (Nov. 5.)—Carlyle Blackwell as Hobart Schuyler is the very life of this picture. The story is very good and has a strong dramatic interest. It deals with the cupidity of a couple who, in order to enrich themselves, try to kill their nephew, who is heir to their brothers' estate. He is nursed back to life, and returns to confront them with the proof of their guilt. The attempt to murder with explosive cartridges presents a new idea. The finale, in which the escape from the safe is staged, is somewhat à la Jimmy Valentine and is fully as interesting.

The Yellow Streak. Patheplay. (Nov. 5.)—The photography and settings are probably the most telling point in this drama. The story is good though not new. Harry, aside from being lazy, is a gambler. His wife, Marjorie, tries to get him a position but fails. Finally she gets him work with a young author as secretary. After working here some little time he steals money from his benefactor, and shoots himself accidentally in the fight. The novelist tries to keep the matter quiet but the truth of her husband's many dastardly acts becomes known and she soon loses faith in his memory.

The President's Pardon. Patheplay. General Film Co. Exclusive Service. Three parts. (Nov. 5.)—A vitally interesting drama, dealing with conditions and fortifications in the Canal zone and introducing former President Taft, Castro, the revolutionist, and Frank Coffyn, the aeronaut. The insurgents steal the plans of the fort from a young lieutenant, who is accused of having sold them. He is sentenced to death for his act. His little daughter goes with Coffyn to Taft and secures a pardon. In the meantime a brother officer succeeds in arresting the real offenders and all are reconciled.

The Woman Scorned. Essanay. (Nov. 5.) General Film Co. Exclusive Service.—A very clever burlesque that will amuse all. Josephine Duval and Francis X. Bushman play the stellar parts. Josephine is a little girl, whom novel-reading has hurt. She believes the architect is in love with her and writes him notes. These notes are misconstrued by him, as they are anonymous and he proposes to Josephine's older sister, who finally accepts him. The little girl cannot be pacified, believing herself scorned Finally a life-size doll brings about a reconciliation.

Ancient Temples of Karnak. Vitagraph. (Nov. 5.)—One of the most illusive studies in the world is Egyptology, and a glimpse at the reason it is so hard is shown in this picture. The Temple of Ammon is featured and a good panorama of it photographed with far and near views. The latter show the myriad of hieroglyphics covering the surface. Temples and Sphinxes built thirteen hundred and more years before the Christian era are shown and explained. The sub-titles are many and expressive.

A Broken Melody. Vitagraph. (Nov. 6.)—A drama of love vs. duty, in which the former conquers. Hazel Henderson as the musician's daughter is admirably suited. She is one of the most beautiful women on the screen. Blair, a Secret Service agent, is confronted by the problem of whether to resign or arrest the father of Margaret for a crime he had committed twenty years before. He resigns and goes to their house, where the strains of music are coming from the window. Suddenly they cease and on going indoors they find the old man dead, by his beloved harpsichord.

Pathe's Weekly, No. 65, 1913. (Nov. 6.)—This is the third number in which but one foreign item appears. Mayor Kline, of New York, with the Board of Estimate inspect the new auto busses. The children of Newark, N. J., are seen celebrating Hallowe'en in the good old-fashioned style. A commendable bit of bravery on the part of a camera man in the taking of the pictures of a battle between deputies and miners in Trinidad, Colo., deserves recognition. The Kaiser, the most photographed man in Europe, is "taken" at Treves, Germany. A scene from the recent New York political fight is also interesting. President Wilson, at Mobile, poses well and seems to enjoy the fun. "Bud" Fisher and his "Mutt and Jeff" finishes the film.

The Price of Victory. Lubin. Two parts. (Nov. 6.)—A dreamy reminiscent drama, possessing several commendable scenes. Col. Carey, an old veteran, dreams of the great war fifty years ago, and in his dreams he sees himself refight his battles. The terrible price of his greatest victory was the death of his fancee, who was killed in an heroic attempt to win the battle by taking Carey's place. The final scene possesses much strength.

"Where's the Baby?" Biograph. (Nov. 6.)—An antique idea with one or two variations. A mother loses her baby. She has handed it to a man to hold and he gave it to a boy who in turn passed it on, etc., etc. An eloping couple finally get it and return it. But little laughter at the Herald Square Theatre when it was released there.

Sydney and Its Harbor. (Melies. Nov. 6.)—Sydney is said to have one of the finest natural harbors in the world. The Melies Company shows many views of the harbor and city. The photography is fair. The film is so perceptibly padded that it becomes a little monotonous.

The Buried Past. Broncho. Two parts.—A conventional story with several inconsistencies. A girl, unhappy, leaves her home and husband, and goes to Arizona, where she obtains work as a waitress. The husband is imprisoned for eighteen months, the cause not being even hinted at. On his release, he traces his wife and finds her married to another man. The ex-husband is killed in a fight with the new husband. Even in Arizona bigamy is against the law. If the girl had been legally freed the audience should know it.

The Children's Hour. Thanhouser. Depicting realistically Longfellow's beautiful poem of the same name, and featuring the "Thanhouser Twins" and the "Thanhouser Kidlet." The father is played by Harry Benham. The sub-titles are lines of verse. Credit is due the director and photographer. A few feet of trick protography is introduced with good effect.

The Golden Cross. World Special Films Co. Three reels. (Nov. 10.)—A story with many heart thrills, that should hold the attention of the audience from start to finish. Founded on the old Italian story of the same name. Count Gaston is reduced to the worst circumstances, having run away with another woman and deserted his wife and child. He returns later, his attentions to his wife naturally being repulsed. He wants to see his little daughter and is given permission by the padre of the school which the child attends, if he will remain incognito. He is to know her by a gold cross. In the meantime, the little girl, out of pity for an orphan friend, gives her the cross. The Count, believing the child to be his, showers her with love and nearly goes mad when she dies. The truth of the child's death is broken to him gently, and his wife, seeing his awful suffering, becomes reconciled to him.

A Face from the Past. Edison. Two Reels. (Nov. 7.)—In this case one feels that the picture is not strengthened by the announced wedding as a finale. Two men are in love with the same girl. She marries one and goes with him to the city where he is a successful broker. She dies soon after. Forbes, the rival, also goes to the city, and after years of work also becomes a big broker. He sees a chance to crush his former rival and without compunction does so. The ruined man goes to the West with his daughter. Forbes also goes some time later and meets the girl after he has had an accident. He recognizes her from her resemblance to her mother, his former sweetheart. The two rivals are reconciled. Mary Fuller plays both mother and daughter. Augustus Phillips is very good.

Tightwad's Present. Kalem. (Nov. 7.)—In the vernacular "some" tightwad. Having promised a present to his spouse and not wishing to spend much, he sees his chance when through an error he breaks a vase and so sends her the pieces, hoping she will think it was broken in transit. By mistake she gets a good one, which the company later demands back and the truth comes out and poor Tightwad is caught.

Flaming Hearts. Vitagraph. (Nov. 7.)—Persons weighing less than 200 pounds are absolutely tabooed from entering this comedy. The leading parts are played by John Bunny, Hughey Mack and Josie Sadler. Bunny is an author and is the rival of Mack. The girl favors Bunny. Therefore Mack makes up as him and wins the girl and Bunny attempts suicide in various ways. Mack's make-up was not so bad. The title of the author's masterpiece is "Flaming Hearts," hence the name.

A Phony Alarm. Patheplay. (Nov. 7.)—Rather a silly story of a mix-up over the telephone. A girl hears strange noises over the wire and gets the police and rushes to the house believing there is murder being committed. When she gets there she finds an actor rehearsing his tragic end.

The Schoolmarm's Shooting Match. Selig. (Nov. 7.)—On the same reel with "Views along the Rhine." A school teacher, not one of the "marm" variety, states that who so ever shall beat her at shooting shall win her hand which they are all after. She therefore gives them blank cartridges and she uses ball. She then elopes with an outsider.

The Marble Industry. Kalem. (Nov. 7.)—A similar picture to the Edison release of October 8 called "The Pink Granite Industry," although this later picture is more complete. The methods of extracting the stone, smoothing it, weighing and shipping it are almost the same even to the small details. The pictures were taken at Proctor, Vermont, from where there is 20,000 tons a year shipped.

Just Nobody. Lubin. (Nov. 7.)—General Film Company Exclusive Service.—A pathetic story of the poorhouse and its sequel. An old pair, the man being paralyzed, are sent to the County Home to be taken care of. The woman obtains work in a neighboring farm and is poorly treated. She finally saves her mistress and little girl and is then made one of the family. Dad has an operation which cures his paralysis and the two are rejoined, to their great happiness.

The Switchman's Mistake. Cines-Kleine. (Nov. 7.) General Film Co. Exclusive Service.—The mannerisms and action of this drama are distinctly foreign to the American screen. This does not mean that they are not good, for they are. The tale deals with vengeance and jealousy in the accepted European form. Arthur having been discharged from the bank plans revenge on his former employer. The bomb which he has planted is found by his friend who is accused and sent to prison. Arthur sends him a potion which produces a sleep like death and he so escapes. In disguise goes to his sister's house. His brother-in-law, seeing a stranger with his sister, becomes terribly enraged and throws the switch in an attempt to wreck the train he is on. His little daughter, however, throws the switch again in time, and the train is saved. There are several intensely exciting moments, the action being well timed.

A Quarter Back. Essanay. (Nov. 7.) General Film Co., Exclusive Service.—This is not a football story. A better title perhaps would have been "The Scoop." The story is about a newspaper office and is a comedy. The cub reporter telegraphs in that he is on the trail of an elopement and asks for the yacht of the editor and $100. Later, he wires he is bringing the elopers to the office. He then enters, and as the cameras snap it is seen that he and the boss's daughter are the elopers. He has just a quarter left of the hundred dollars. Billy Mason and Ruth Hennessy play the leads.

Elise, The Forester's Daughter. Edison. (Nov. 8)—"Woman is a miracle of divine contradiction"—Michelet. The whole synopsis of this story is expressed in that one line. Elise is a forester's daughter, as the title shows. She is loved by Jean, a neighbor, but apparently does not care for him. A stranger, who has been hiring the services of her father as a guide takes her instead, and Jean follows through jealousy only to get shot accidentally. The stranger's sister finds him and carries him home in her machine. When Elise hears of it she drops everything and runs to him and thus she proves her contrariness.

Old Coupons. Biograph. (Nov. 8.)—Not a bad advertisement for United Cigar Store coupons, though not meant to be. "Old Coupons" is an old man who has made his living by collecting these tickets and selling them. He is set upon by some ruffians and robbed, but saved from injury by a mechanic returning from work. The gang then swear vengeance upon the workman, but their plans are spoiled by the decisive action of "Old Coupons." Finally when the old man has died his property is found to amount to quite a sum which he has left to the man who aided him in his distress.

Hiawanda's Cross. Lubin. (Nov. 8.)—A story of the mysticism which has always surrounded the symbol of Christianity in the eyes of the American Indian. Hiawanda, an Indian girl, steals a cross from the breast of a missionary. Her Indian lover, jealous, wounds the white man. Hiawanda nurses him back to life and health, when he, receiving a call from a large parish in the East determines to go, not knowing the extent of the love of the Indian girl. She knowing she has lost him, and being spurned by her tribe, builds a boat and floats away down the river. Where to, is the natural question asked, but no answer can be returned. The ending might have been improved on.

Broncho Billy's Secret. Essanay. (Nov. 8.)—Not so clever as some of the Broncho Billy series, but with plenty of clean action. Billy loves a girl, and she has promised to marry him. Her father is a thief, having held up a number of stages, and Billy as the sheriff wants him. Billy finally gets on his track and follows him with a posse. The crook is wounded by one of the posse and Billy then discovers his identity and receives his confession.

Between the Rifle Sights. Selig. (Nov. 10.) General Film Company Exclusive Service.—The hatred of a wronged man, smoldering for many years in the prison, is quenched at the decisive moment by a woman's face. Bob, now an old man, fresh from prison, looking over the rifle sights waiting until his enemy shall appear, thinks of his past. He sees his fiancée marry his rival through the latter's lying. He sees himself sent to prison for twenty years for an offense the other had committed. He sees the life in the terrible prison, and now he waits the other's coming. Finally, when he does drive up with his daughter, the older man is unable to shoot because of her resemblance to the mother whom he had loved. And so he passes on his way. A beautiful picture, artistically photographed and cleverly acted.

The Wheels of Safety. Essanay. (Nov. 10.) Two Reels. General Film Company Exclusive Service.—The title might be more expressive. A thrilling story, in which G. M. Anderson has an unusual rôle, that of a doctor. A girl and her father, a very old man, are rescued from a fire by some rustlers. The girl is forced to marry one of them, a villain, who gambles with the others for her. He treats her very cruelly and finally she falls ill. "Doc" Sharp (G. M. Anderson) is called by the father, and when he has heard the story of her existence he takes her away with him. Here follows the most exciting chase imaginable. The wagon driven by Anderson hardly stays on the ground. It is not trick photography, but the real thing. The doctor defends the girl when they reach home until the posse arrives and follows the desperadoes, shooting the husband in the fight.

A Water-Soaked Hero. Lubin (Nov. 10.) General Film Company Exclusive Service.—A very clever comedy that will set any audience in roars. A fat man is taking a bath, and manages to tear down the pipes and floods the whole house. The reserves are called out, but it takes the cook's friend, semi-drunk though he is, to become the hero and arrest a thief who had fallen through the skylight. Many women add to the humor.

The New Maid. Lubin. (Nov. 10.) General Film Company Exclusive Service.—The plot in this film upon which all the humor hinges is so aged. Jane loves a fellow, to whom her father objects. In order to see one another he dresses up as the maid and gets a position in her house, and so on.

Thieves. Vitagraph. (Nov. 10).—There are two classes of crooks or thieves. It is the purpose of this film to demonstrate this theory, or rather fact. "Blinkey," who is just out of jail, is one of the "regular guys" that make thieving and housebreaking a "profession." He is, however, very useful in this case, stopping the other class of thieves from stealing a will. A millionaire has disinherited some relations in favor of his ward. They, learning of this, attempt to destroy the new will. "Blinkey," who has called with the intention of investigating the contents of the safe, seeing their action, interferes with them at the point of a gun, locks the safe and destroys the combination so they cannot reopen it.

The Runaway Freight. Kalem. Two Parts. (Nov. 10).—There has been no expense saved to make this a good picture, and it is one of the best of the "season." It is a railroad yarn and true to life. Billy and Ruth are in love with one another. His rival, the conductor of the freight on which he works, tries in every way to make him give up his job. Billy gets hurt in a fight with two tramps, who are instigated by the conductor, and his mother forces him to give up his work. Later he saves a train that had broken loose by a wonderful jump from one car to another, and is quite the hero of the day, winning the girl.

No Place for Father. Biograph. (Nov. 10).—This isn't a comedy; it is a drama, and very true to life, except in one or two places, where it may be a little exaggerated. A good release. A boy comes to the city to make his way. He gets a good job through his father and does well, soon after marrying. Getting into fast society, he becomes heavily in debt. His father is shown the door when he visits him, the son being ashamed of his shabbiness. To make up his indebtedness the boy steals The father, hearing of it, makes good the loss to save his new-born child the disgrace, and then forever leaves his son's life.

The Locked Room. Lubin. (Nov. 10).—Although this is chronicled a drama, it should be called a comedy. A wife locks a certain room, thereby exciting her husband's curiosity. She is seen in the company of other men often, and the husband commences to get jealous. It finally reaches a limit with him. He forces her to give up the key to the room, and on opening the door finds the room all fixed up in honor of his coming birthday, which he had forgotten.

Pathe's Weekly, No. 66. Pathe. Nov. 10).—An unusually good number. The swimmer, Henry Elionski, in his swim from the Brooklyn Bridge to Bay Ridge handcuffed and shackled, towing a boat with seven men in it, is the most interesting item. The dedication of some of the buildings for the exposition in San Francisco was given much space. Opening the new all-water route to New Orleans from Alabama and the christening of the first boat was novel. A good picture of King Alphonso of Spain, after he had pardoned the man who attempted his life, is shown. Working to try and find safety devices for railroads to use to prevent wrecks is of timely interest. Baseball is revived with pictures of the reception offered Walter Johnson and Larry Cheney, the pitchers, in Coffeyville, Kansas, Remarkable pictures of a bull-fight in Spain are clever and well photographed. President Wilson in Princeton casting his vote and the students' reception are to the point. The new wireless station, which is the largest in the world, at Marshall, Cal., and a review of evening gowns in Paris complete the picture.

The Fire Department of Santa Barbara made a test run for speed which will be used in the "Flying A" production "At Midnight," scheduled for release November 29. Stop watches were used by members of the department and a record run, not only pleasing to the department, but very effective on the screen, was secured.

Have You Made Money?

Some exhibitors have. Others have not. The Motion Picture News offers a complete photographic equipment free to the exhibitor writing the best story of his "Experiences as an Exhibitor"

The Offer Includes

A high class motion picture camera, tripod, panoramic tilting head, and four magazines, each holding two hundred feet of film. It can be used by any exhibitor to take motion pictures of local families, local events, and advertising film for merchants in his city. Detailed instructions for operating the camera, and ways and means by which it can be used to earn money for the winner will be included.

Conditions Governing the Contest

The story must not exceed two thousand words. Write on one side of the paper only, and have it typewritten, if possible. Write about your actual experiences; how you started, and why; tell about your greatest problem in making the theatre pay; how you met competition; how you manage your employes, and of the adverse conditions you had to overcome. If you believe in advertising, tell why, and in what way.

There are thousands of exhibitors in the United States struggling to make their theatres pay. Your business problems, how you met them, and the hardships and experiences you endured will put new courage into many of them, and, perhaps, give them the solution to a problem which will enable them to turn losses into profits.

The Contest Will End March 1, 1914

All stories, complying with the requirements of the contest, will be published. Editors of The Motion Picture News will make the award. Please address your story to

GERMANY TO EXPLOIT SELF BY FILMS

Conference of the leading personages in the German steel and iron trade was held in Berlin during the week, according to published reports. Its object was the forming of an organization to push German trade more vigorously in foreign markets and on entirely novel lines.

The main object of the conference was to organize the Association for the Promotion of German Export Trade, with the sub-title of League for Foreign Propaganda.

The scheme of the new organization contemplates the elaborate use of motion pictures for spreading the gospel of "Made in Germany" in foreign parts.

Films illustrating the achievements of German industry in the most graphic style are to be shown in connection with lectures in the native tongue of each particular district. Special films and lectures for various branches of industry will be employed. The speakers are to talk in such general terms (so the prospectus explains) that the real motive of the propaganda will not be apparent.

ALMOST A TRAGEDY

Director Oscar Eagle is now putting forth one of the most ambitious war plays ever attempted in moving pictures for the Selig Polyscope Company, and has spent a great deal of time in studying out dramatic detail. In the same line in another direction, Gabriel Pollock, the scenic artist of the plant, has expended a great deal of energy, cleverness and enterprise in devising effects and making scenes that have been carried out with exact regard for historic exactitude.

This involved the making of batteries of the largest sort of sea-guns used in marine operations during the Civil War.

In the working of one of these big guns from the rolling platform of a battleship, a careless gunner happened to leave a four-foot projectile in the gun, in the rush and hurry of rehearsal. When the big piece was discharged it carried the projectile across Lake Selig, and through the fence a block away, barely missing a number of peeking spectators and several teams that were passing.

Singularly enough, Mr. Pollock, who was in the distant field directing operations, happened to be only a few inches out of the path of this flying projectile that wrecked the wall of the Selig plant.

Director Eagle, who witnessed the flight of this real shot, after an anxious few seconds, ascertaining whether anyone had been seriously maimed or killed, remarked with a wan smile: "General Sherman was right. War is hell!"

AMBROSIO "SATAN" IN DEMAND

It is reported from various sources that the Ambrosio's masterpiece, "Satan," in four parts, seven reels, is still in demand. The exhibitors are candid in their expression that it is a big box-office gainer. The Supreme Feature Film Company, of 64 East Fourteenth Street, New York City, which has made such a wonderful success with it in the City and State of New York, has just acquired the rights to this film for the States of North and South Dakota and Minnesota. Live-wires in that territory are asked to make connections.

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality — that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

LOOKING UP THE EXCLUSIVE SERVICE

H. J. Cohen, manager of the Exclusive Film Service for the General Film Company, formerly buyer for The Selig Polyscope Company, went to Chicago this week, looking up the interests of the big new enterprise and declared that they were more than satisfied with results up to date. Returns had more than realized expectations, and the films from the Middle West were of extraordinarily fine character. Mr. Cohen, who is a hustler, finished up a week's work in two days, and although he loves Chicago, he came back East full of joy.

FULTON REPRESENTS PATHE IN CHICAGO

E. E. Fulton, one of the leading supply men of this country, who for several years past has represented the Lubin brand of films in Chicago, recently made an agreement with the Pathe people whereby he will also represent that concern in the Windy City.

Mr. Fulton's exhibition rooms are sought by many for the purpose of showing advance releases. It is one of the finest equipped in the city, having two motor-driven machines and a good curtain. Mr. Fulton has many other interests and is also owner of several motion picture theatres in Chicago.

ROLANDS ADDRESSES ROUND TABLE CLUB

At the first monthly meeting of the Round Table Club, George K. Rolands, a scenario writer and motion picture directors, made an address in which he advocated many reforms anent the higher realms of dramatic art as related to the picture as a means of theatrical entertainment.

The Round Table Club is an exclusive organization of women, the larger part of whom have attained prominence in the fields of literature and drama. Among those present was Mme. Pilar-Morin, the French pantomimiste, who expressed herself as fully in accord with Mr. Rolands' views.

NOTICE OF CORRECTION

Referring to the advertisement of Warner's Features which appeared in the issue of the Moving Picture World for Nov. 15th, in which they mention the Eclair Film Company as being one of the manufacturers supplying them with films, the Eclair Company expressly desire to correct this impression. They are making films solely for The Universal Film Mfg. Co. of New York. While the Eclair Company appreciates that Warner's Features referred to the Eclair-Paris Company the statement was a trifle misleading, and they desire to set the matter right in the eyes of all concerned.

CLERGY LIKE PASQUALI "POMPEII"

The clergy of New York are enthusiastic over the Pasquali production, "The Last Days of Pompeii." Every day reservations are made for several of them, and every denomination has been represented among the audiences at the Park Theatre where the Pasquali production is playing to crowded houses.

TEACH SANITATION BY FILMS

The Department of Public Health at Washington, D. C., has entered the motion picture business. Arrangements were made for a long series of motion pictures of the Health Department, its personnel, work, and sanitary means employed to prevent disease. The films are expected to instruct generally in sanitation.

SPEAKING OF STREET CARS

Despite the street-car strike, which paralyzed traffic in Indianapolis, the Pasquali production, "The Last Days of Pompeii," played to crowded houses, and since traffic has been resumed the S. R. O. sign has been out at every performance.

meets Richard Danvers, the elder son of the Earl of Danvers. It is a case of love at first sight.

Like many English noblemen, the Earl of Danvers does not depend solely upon his heritage, being an inventor of great ability. His invention of a new X-ray machine is, in the opening part of the story, unsuccessful. This, combined with the degeneracy of his younger son, brings failure and ruin to the respected Earl of Danvers and his family. Richard, the elder son, is engaged to Dorothy, and is forced through financial ruin to break the engagement, and goes to America to seek his fortune in the mines.

Her love for Richard, and her wonderful knowledge of the big American country Richard is going to, prompts her to follow her sweetheart. She engages passage on the same steamer and boards the same train unbeknown to her lover. She precedes him to the big open country, and, changing her pretty traveling dress for the picturesque Indian dress of her girlhood days, she encounters many experiences.

When Richard arrives in the mining country he purchases an outfit to try his luck as a prospector, and at a psychological moment confronts Dorothy fighting for her life in the hands of a Western desperado. Richard breaks into the cabin and saves Dorothy, known only as Pepita in this country.

Dorothy at no time gives any sign of recognition to Richard, and in this powerful dramatic situation, where she finds Richard at death's door, she still retains her identity. Not until he has been summoned home by a message from his father advising him of the success of his experimenting does she determine to retrace her steps to England. After Richard has been welcomed into the heart of his family she tells him of her dual rôle, and explains that she practiced the deceit because of her great love for him.

COMING WARNER'S FEATURES

A trio of interesting pictures will be released soon by Warner's Features. One of them is "Treasure Island," after the famous story written by Robert Louis Stevenson. It has been done into a three-reel feature by W. V. Ranous, an old Vitagraph star and director. Mr. Ranous plays the part of Peg-leg Silver. "Aladdin and His Wonderful Lamp," featured by the work of Elsie Albert as the Princess, is the second. The third release is "In the Toils of an Adventuress," a melodrama.

JUST PLAIN COMMON SENSE tells you when you want to SEE yourself you use a Mirror. Because you SEE yourself better with a Mirror than any other means in the world. Now the same thing applies when you want to SEE motion pictures, use a MIRROR SCREEN because you SEE the pictures so much plainer, better and clearer on a Mirror Screen than on any other surface under the sun. Besides, it tickles your patrons and makes picture fans. It's a fact. The difference between a motion picture on a MIRROR SCREEN and any other screen of any other kind is the same comparison between seeing your own reflection in a fine French plate glass mirror and in a mud puddle. The "MIRROR SCREEN" is a Mirror. A magnificentmirror made from the finest polished plate glass that the world can produce. Get Right and Write to us to-day for our new Snow White Prismized Finished Surface.

who represents the Vitagraph Company of America across the pond, mailed from London.

The Eclectic Film Company will release three features a month, thus increasing its former output by one. "The Life of Napoleon" will be the next release.

The Pasquali production of "The Last Days of Pompeii" continues to fill the Park Theatre. The film has been edited and retitled by Stanley Twist and is vastly improved. A new organ has been installed and special music written to fit the picture.

Out in St. Louis a bill has been introduced before the City Council providing for film censorship.

David Miles, formerly head producer for Kinemacolor, and chief at the Reliance studios for a brief time, is now producing pictures for Biograph. He has taken with him many members of his old Kinemacolor company, including Linda Griffith, Clara Bracy, Charles Perley, Charles Fleming and Jack Brammal.

Webster Cullison will establish a permanent Western branch of the Eclair company at Tucson, Ariz. He left last Sunday with ten players and a camera man, and more will follow.

All is hustle and bustle again at the Universal studios at Coytesville. Mark Dintenfass is back as studio manager, and Walter McNamara is producing features with his company headed by Jane Gail and Matt Moore. Work is now going on on a two-part picture, "The Story of David Grieg."

By the way, Paul Scardon's little Beaming Belle bull pup continues to win prizes "hands down" at the dog shows. Paul has been entering her in every show that comes along, and she bids fair to become as well known as her actor-owner. At the recent Grand Central Palace show, Beaming Belle won several prizes.

Owing to the fact that cables are neither capitalized nor punctuated, the following startling message was received at the New York office of Midgar Features from G. Blake Garrison, who is at present in London:

"I know how wild animals live. Will eat-em-alive in New York. Capacity London."

The cable gets a little more human when you punctuate it and capitalize it as it should be: "I know 'How Wild Animals Live' will 'eat-em-alive' in New York. Capacity London."

REAL PUGILISTS IN FILM

That Thomas H. Ince, managing director of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, believes in injecting as much realism as possible in the picture that he has under his direction, was manifested when, just before he started working on the Domino photoplays, "The Heart of Kathleen" and "Widow Maloney's Faith," he took a trip up to San Francisco and brought back to Santa Monica two pugilists, known for their ability in assimilating punches on the jaw. They were used since in the plays in conjunction with Richard Stanton.

Stanton is a boxer of no mean ability, and in scenes where he has to use his hands or "put up his dukes," Mr. Ince has had quite a little trouble, for the actors refused to go on, as Stanton cannot seem to acquire the habit of "pulling" his punches.

In "The Heart of Kathleen," Stanton, as the hero, is upon the scaffold about to be hung, when suddenly he starts swinging right and left, and each of the two bruisers, acting as guards, take one on the jaw and go down for the count.

HUTCHINSON TO OPEN FEATURE EXCHANGE IN CHICAGO

George Hutchinson, who has been manager of the H. & H. branch of the Mutual Film Corporation in Chicago since the formation of that company, has launched out for himself and will shortly open a feature exchange in the Powers Building, Chicago. Quarters have already been secured, and Mr. Hutchinson says he has several big features. He is a brother of S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Company.

MAKE STEEL OPERATOR'S TABLE

The Columbia Metal Box Company, of 226 to 228 East 144th Street, New York City, is putting on the market a decidedly practical article for film men. It is an all-steel table for the operator to rewind, join, or cut films on. It is in use in several offices, including that of the True Feature Film Company, and is regarded as indispensable where used.

ENTER ANOTHER KESSEL

Nicholas Kessel, a younger brother of Adam and Charles Kessel, of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, by purchasing and amalgamating the Regal Feature Film Company and A. B. C. Feature Film Company, has become quite a factor in the feature film business.

The exchange will be located at 381 Sixth avenue, New York City, and in addition to the fifty odd two, three, four and five-act features he now has on hand, Mr. Kessel is in the field to purchase the best features that can be procured.

Mr. Kessel is a well-known real estate operator, but has been a student of the motion picture business from its inception.

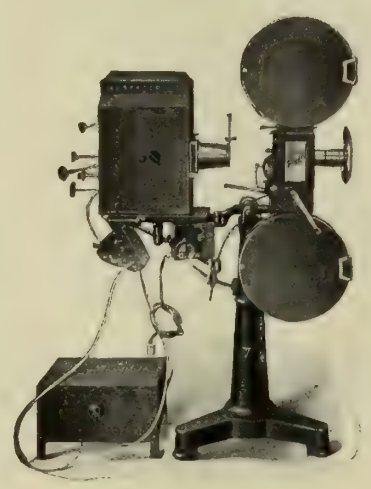
Simplex

ASK YOURSELF



WHY—The Simplex has become so wonderfully popular in such a short time.

WHY—90 per cent. and more of the film manufacturers and importers selected this projector in preference to all others for the exhibition of their pictures in their studios and offices.

WHY—Simplex projectors are built so heavy, accurate and costly.

WHY—Simplex machines project such wonderfully steady, flickerless pictures.

WHY—Simplex projectors successfully compete with over forty different makes of American and European projectors.

WHY—Simplex machines were selected by the Regent Theatre, known as the best and largest moving picture theatre in the City of New York, after a competitive test with other makes.

WHY—You don't buy a Simplex at once and reap the benefits of its use.

Investigate to-day. Catalogue B explains much.

Get In Line!!

The new Eclectic Natural Color Process films are far ahead of anything that you have ever seen, and totally eclipse the ordinary colored films. We are setting a new mark with this stupendous feature film, which is the first of a new line of "something—new" multiple reel photoplays in preparation for future release. All other records for colored features are surpassed by this colossal and extraordinary production:—

His Fateful Passion

(Copyrighted)

Five Parts Natural Coloring Ready Dec. 11th

This remarkable photoplay is replete with exciting events, tense situations, and thrilling action, but has a strong moral tone throughout. It pictures the desperation to which a man is driven by the cravings of a ruling passion, the sorrows and heartaches of those dependent on him, and the fatal summing-up of his misdeeds. A mighty dynamite explosion, destroying an entire mountain side, presents a tremendous and awe-inspiring spectacle that will send the chills along your spine.

Toils of Villainy

(Copyrighted)

Three Parts Natural Coloring Ready Nov. 27th

A circus owner, insanely jealous, imprisons one of the performers, a tight-rope walker, in her apartment to prevent her warning her lover, whose death is planned. She escapes by walking a telegraph wire and arrives just in time to prevent her sweetheart from being murdered.

These territories are still open on a contract basis:—

Exclusive Service

The genius conjured by the General Film Company to open the golden gates of MOVIELAND to the managers of first-class theatres, and exhibitors who feel the sting of competition.

MOVIELAND is vast and roomy. Its boundaries are as rangy and distant as those of the United States. It is the richest country in the world. It receives a daily tribute of half a million dollars! Half a million dollars a day!—and it has but 18,000 houses to divide this flow of gold. There is room for many, many more, and now the gates are open.

Exclusive Service

Enables the showman to increase the tribute by putting on an entertainment that no one else in the territory of his house can possibly secure inside of 90 days. It enables him to advertise his house and his show without the slightest danger of his competitor reaping a nickel's worth of the benefit.

Exclusive Service

Offers three weekly programs, perfectly balanced—new—and of the same quality that has made the "G. F." regular service pre-eminent. It includes 2-, 3- and 4-reel features—"G. F." features, which have long been known as the BEST. Come into MOVIELAND and eat of its golden fruits.

ADVERTISING AN ECONOMY

ADVERTISING—in some form or other—is a commercial necessity. If you have something to sell you must tell the buyer about it—in some way.

* * * *

PRINTED advertising is NOT a necessity.

* * * *

BUT it is an economy.

* * * *

HENCE printed advertising.

* * * *

YOU don't HAVE to use it. You could start right out and tell everybody about your product; or you could employ others to do that. But it would be very expensive—in money and time.

* * * *

IT is more economical—much more—to use the mails; and quicker.

* * * *

AND here again you have alternatives.

* * * *

YOU can send out your own printed matter: letters, booklets and the like; or you can even publish your own medium to carry your advertising.

* * * *

YOU can do this: And it isn't economical—not as economical as it is to take advantage of an established journal which goes through the mails cheaply and never into the waste-paper basket.

* * * *

YOU want to reach 10,000 people, let us say. Very well, the mailing then of a letter will cost you in postage $200.00 alone. You can have a magazine or newspaper carry this same message for you for a few dollars per ten thousand circulation.

* * * *

AS for your own publication you not only bear its heavy publishing charges, and Uncle Sam very properly calls your medium an advertising house-organ and charges you high mailing rates. All of which is frightfully expensive.

* * * *

AGAIN, it is certainly more convincing to the buyer to have your message given him through a disinterested medium, a medium he knows and believes in, and to which he pays a yearly subscription price for authoritative information about his business.

* * * *

THERE is not a medium so strong that it can say to you: "You can only reach your market through me!" But a 9,000, established medium does offer you economy—in cost and results. That's all.

* * * *

YOU CAN waste money in the best medium—in many ways.

* * * *

IT may not reach the people you want.

* * * *

YOUR copy may not be of the "pulling" kind.

* * * *

YOU may advertise too little or too much.

* * * *

YOU may rely too greatly on one medium.

* * * *

ALONG the latter lines I would like to say this:

* * * *

ONE of the big million-circulation magazines in this country once tried to induce advertisers to put their entire appropriation in this one medium. Naturally, the most facile argument used was that duplication would thereby be avoided.

* * * *

THE scheme didn't work—for the simple reason that duplication should not be avoided. This is an accepted fact—to-day.

* * * *

IT can be avoided by simply having different copy run in each medium. But duplication—letting several mediums tell your message—is impressive, and the basic force of advertising is to impress your buyer.

* * * *

IT doesn't cost any more. A judicious division of large and small space will stretch your appropriation through several mediums just as long as injudicious space in one.

* * * *

ALL this, of course, provided you select the medium that is built for and reaches your market.

WILLIAM ALLEN JOHNSTON.

"BIG GUNS" AMONG LICENSED MANUFACTURERS TAKE

A. E. Smith of Vitagraph Company Gives Interesting and Intimate Details of Deals in Licensed Fold—Dyer Ends Direct Testimony—All Dwell on Competition Between Licensed Firms

TAKING of testimony by the defense in the Federal suit against the Motion Picture Patents Company as a trust under the Sherman law went right along during the past week at the Hotel Manhattan where Edward N. Hacker, special referee, is holding the hearings.

During the past few days the most important witnesses were Frank L. Dyer, president of the General Film Company; Albert E. Smith, treasurer of the Vitagraph Company of America; John E. Hardin, of the Edison Company, and J. A. Berst, vice-president of the firm of Pathe Freres and head of the American branch of that concern. Several exhibitors were also called, among them Jonas A. Korpell, who has a theatre at 159th street and Broadway, New York; Nathan Machat, of Brooklyn; Fred Jeffries, of Jersey City, and Frank J. Howard, of Boston. Mr. Howard is one of the exchange men who sold out his business to the General Film Company. Within the past ten days he has opened in Scollay Square, Boston, a combined motion picture and vaudeville theatre, the cost of which is estimated at $1,500,000.

John E. Hardin on Stand

The tenor of the testimony of the witnesses was much the same. They testified that before the formation of the Patents Company motion picture producers were much hampered by fear of litigation over patents, and that before the formation of the General Film Company the exchange end of the business was unstable and conducted in an unsatisfactory manner. With the formation of these two companies, they said, the whole tone of the business was improved.

In addition the witnesses, especially Albert A. Smith, gave a wealth of intimate details of doings inside the Patents Company, of the struggles, fears and hopes of the manufacturers and of the motion picture business in general. While much of this testimony was objected to by the prosecution on the ground that it was irrelevant and incompetent, it is certainly of great interest to persons connected with the motion picture art. Further, the attorneys for the defense, feel it is of legal value, else they would not have introduced it.

On Thursday, November 13, Mr. Dyer finished his direct testimony, and John E. Hardin, of the Edison Company, took the stand for a short time. Mr. Hardin's testimony was confined entirely to projection machines on which he is an authority. He discussed cost and construction of all the prominent makes.

Mr. Dyer took the stand again on Friday, November 14, to be cross-examined by Edward P. Grovesnor, who represents the attorney-general in this case. After sparring for several questions Mr. Grovesnor introduced upon the record a copy of a letter from J. J. Kennedy to William Pelzer, dated January 23, 1912, referring to matters spread upon the records of the General Film Company at the meeting of the Board of Directors held October 11, 1910.

Go Into William Fox's Case

At that time it was made a matter of record that the General Film Company had purchased thirty-nine exchanges, and had licensed twenty others, making a total of fifty-nine licensed exchanges. The amount of business controlled by the General Film Company, based on the number of reels, was set at seventy-one per cent of the business of the country at that time.

By further questions Mr. Grovesnor attempted to show that the Patents Company before the formation of the General Film Company had licensed more than one hundred exchanges, and that eighteen months after the formation of the General Film Company none of these were handling licensed films. Charles F. Kingsley, one of the attorneys for the defense, then took Mr. Dyer in hand for a short re-direct examination.

Albert E. Smith, treasurer of the Vitagraph Company of America, then took the chair and remained there for the rest of the day.

"Are you appearing to testify for yourself," asked Mr. Grovesnor.

"I don't know," said Mr. Smith.

Then followed a short discussion as to whether or not Mr. Smith was under subpoena and entitled to immunity if he testified.

The first subject taken up was the matter of the cancellation by the General Film Company of the license held by William Fox and his Greater New York Film Rental Company. A suit is pending over this cancellation in which Mr. Smith was a witness. It was evident that in the other suit Fox has testified that he had called on Mr. Smith at the Vitagraph plant in Flatbush in November, 1911. That Fox had also claimed that Smith had told him (Fox) that he (Smith) had always taken Fox's part at the meetings of the General Film Company, and had always had the acquiescence of J. A. Berst, but that when Mr. Berst had failed to support Mr. Smith's talk in behalf of Fox the directors of the General Film had thereupon "jobbed" Fox by cancelling his license contrary to Smith's wish was also evident from testimony. At the morning session Mr. Smith denied that what Mr. Fox said was true. He said he did not have such a conversation with Fox.

Trick Pictures Saved Industry

At the afternoon session Mr. Smith said that Fox told him he wanted $100,000 for his exchange, needing the money for a partner, and that he told Fox he would do what he could.

"The object of the formation of the General Film Company," went on Mr. Smith, "was to start a model exchange to serve as an example for the other exchanges then operating.

"I myself have been in the business since 1896 or 1897. After the Spanish war and the interest in pictures of soldiers ended, the public became apathetic to pictures as the subjects were of no interest until Gaston Melies began making trick pictures. Then came the travelling show, an operator with a projection machine and a little film touring the country. At this time moving pictures were shown as a side show at carnivals in the "black tent." Then dramas came in, and later the release date idea was introduced and universally adopted. When the General Film Company was formed it was never contemplated that this firm would do all the business of the country.

"The Vitagraph Company of America at its beginning had endless troubles because of possible Edison patents suits. Once we felt all we lost because a man sneaked in and snipped off a few inches of film. We were so scared that we quit entirely in 1901 and 1902. Then we made some negatives and turned them over to Edison who gave us a royalty on the positive prints sold.

Melies' Ups and Downs

"Then came the re-issue of the Edison patents which wiped out all the old injunctions against us, and we began again in earnest in 1904 and bought land in Brooklyn where our present studio stands. Then we became an Edison licensee and paid a royalty of half a cent a foot. Safe from litigation we doubled the capacity of the studio.

STAND AS PATENTS COMPANY CONTINUES DEFENSE

J. A. Berst, Head of Pathe, on Stand—Four Exhibitors Tell of Their Troubles Before Licensed Manufacturers Joined Hands and Express Themselves as Pleased With Present Conditions

"In 1908 I invented the 'framing' device now in common use on rejection machines. This does away with the need of stopping the picture when it "gets out of frame."

"Competition is keen among the firms in the Patents Company. Take the Melies Company for instance. Several years ago it fell from selling one hundred prints down to selling a single print of one subject I know. Then J. Stuart Blackton and myself were given permission to go in with Gaston Melies in a small way. We handled the scenarios, edited the pictures and were general advisers. The sale of prints jumped up to fifty or sixty. Then Mr. Melies thought he had absorbed from us enough knowledge of the business, and against our advice, started producing pictures in California with the result that Melies' business is now about down to zero again.

"Our plant is now about ten times the size it was when we became Edison licensees. We have about 150 players in our stock companies.

"Our foreign business has increased. We are now selling about twice as many prints abroad as in this country. We sell to all the world. We have agencies in Berlin, Barcelona, Budapest, Milan, Buenos Ayres, Rio Janeiro, South Africa, Australia, London and Paris.

"Four things go to make a successful picture: a good story, the merit of the production, the acting and the photography and mechanical worth of the picture.

Cost of Production Increases

"Since 1908 our production has increased from two plays a week to six or seven a week. We are now making weekly 12,000 feet of finished negative which means about 30,000 feet of negative before it is edited. Our negative production has increased four hundred per cent, our positive sale only one hundred per cent. The cost of negative per foot has increased four or five times. Since the formation of the General Film Company our profits have steadily decreased because of the increased cost of production. If it were not for our sale of prints abroad we could not do business on the present basis.

"Neither I nor the Vitagraph Company had anything to do with the formation of the Patents Company."

At this point the hearings were adjourned till Tuesday morning.

Bright and early Tuesday morning Mr. Smith was on the stand again for a little more direct testimony under the guidance of Attorney Kingsley.

"The average 'life' of a motion picture is about six months," said Mr. Smith. "Rental exchanges are necessary in the business. Active competition exists between the licensed manufacturers. I should say that of the film produced in this country sixty per cent are dramas, thirty per cent comedies, and the remaining ten per cent scenic subjects. There are between thirty and forty unlicensed producing firms, turning out an aggregate of about one hundred reels a week."

Mr. Smith was then cross-questioned a little about the William Fox case. In reply to one question he said that the Patents Company and the General Film Company had never worked in collusion with each other.

Tuesday afternoon J. A. Gerst, vice-president of the firm of Pathe Freres and head of the American branch of that concern, took the stand.

Mr. Berst's Testimony

"The Pathe Company in America did only an import business until it became an Edison licensee," said Mr. Berst. "After getting the Edison license it built a factory at Bound Brook, N. J., and in 1910 began producing pictures at its studio at Jersey City Heights.

"The General Film Company was needed because the exchanges prior to its formation were injuring the business by renting to the exhibitor badly damaged films. These were often rainy, and sometimes the sensitized part was entirely scraped off, leaving the film blank. In an effort to remedy conditions the General Film Company was formed."

When questioned about patents litigation Mr. Berst said that Pathe paid Edison in royalties between $17,000 and $18,000 in 1908.

"Neither the firm of Pathe nor myself had anything to do with the formation of the Patents Company," said Mr. Berst. "The General Film Company was formed because at that time the exchanges were troublesome factors in the motion picture business. They were not on a sound business basis, and it was to remedy this evil that the General Film Company was formed."

Four licensed exhibitors were on the stand Wednesday. The first was Jonas A. Korpell, who has a theatre at 159th street and Broadway, New York City. He testified that before the formation of the Patents Company he received inferior pictures, that he had to take what the exchange man slid over the counter to him, that he had to "tip" the booker to get good pictures, and that he was unable to advertise pictures in advance. He said the combination of the licensed manufacturers had ended this state of affairs much to his satisfaction.

On the cross-examination Mr. Korpell came forward with a slap at theatres owned by exchanges, the Fox theatres in particular. Mr. Korpell said that Mr. Fox has a theatre within a few blocks of his, and made the accusation that Fox emissaries would copy his programs as advertised in advance and then show the same pictures a day ahead of him.

Howard's Sale Satisfactory

Nathan Machat, of Brooklyn, and Fred Jeffries, of Jersey City, licensed exhibitors, gave testimony along the same lines as Mr. Korpell with the exception that they did not mention Mr. Fox. They expressed themselves as being much pleased with quality of service now obtainable since the licensed manufacturers combined.

Frank J. Howard, of Boston, was the last witness Wednesday. He once conducted an exchange which he sold out to the General Film Company. He said that he had been trying unsatisfactorily to dispose of his exchange for about a year prior to selling it, and he considered the deal most satisfactory. Mr. Howard is interested in a new vaudeville and motion picture theatre in Boston, valued at a million and a half. He talked along the same lines as the others as regards what the formation of the Patents Company and the General Film Company did for the business.

CHICAGO EXHIBITORS WILL ENTERTAIN

Extensive preparations are being made by the Chicago exhibitors to entertain the Executive Committee of the International Motion Picture Association, which meets in that city on December 18 and 19, 1913.

Representatives of twenty-nine States have already notified the secretary of their intention to be present and a large attendance is assured.

After this meeting in Chicago, organizers will be sent throughout the country perfecting the various State organizations of the International Motion Picture Association.

WILLIAM FAVERSHAM THE LATEST RECRUIT

Famous Actor to Appear in Series of Six Dramas, Including "Julius Caesar," for New York Motion Picture Corporation

WILLIAM FAVERSHAM, who has been one of the famous actors of the speaking stage for a good many years, is the latest acquisition to the motion picture art. Faversham, who is now appearing on the Pacific Coast in a pretentious production of "Julius Caesar," has completed negotiations with Thomas H. Ince to appear in a series of six motion picture dramas for the New York Motion Picture Corporation, of which Ince is vice-president and managing director.

Fifty thousand dollars is the sum it is said Faversham will receive for his appearance in these plays, one of which shall be a presentation of "Julius Caesar." The New York Motion Picture Corporation, which has as subsidiary producing companies the Kay-Bee, Broncho, Domino and Keystone brands, has been negotiating with the distinguished actor for the past two weeks and the deal is regarded as completed.

Mr. Ince will erect for the motion picture production of "Julius Caesar" a mammoth representation of a Roman forum and capitol on the plateau near the producing studios of the New York Motion Picture Corporation at Santa Monica, Cal. These will be used for the big scenes in the Shakespearian drama. Mob scenes will also be staged with more than one thousand supernumeraries before the camera.

The contract offered Mr. Faversham calls for his return to Santa Monica after the close of his present starring tour. It is understood that the deal will be positively closed at the end of the tour. In addition to "Julius Caesar," it is planned to present Mr. Faversham and company in four big plays, including the "Faun," "Romeo and Juliet," "Othello" and either "Hamlet" or "Henry VIII."

Mr. Faversham has completed plans for a remarkable season, opening in Toronto in December, and after a few weeks going into New York. He will play in a repertoire of productions, in which he has already starred successfully.

Mr. Faversham's proposed advent upon the screen will mark the entry in the motion picture art of still another actor who is regarded as among the very best of those on the legitimate stage.

HE MADE "QUO VADIS" POSSIBLE

Baron Fassini is the active head of the Cines Company, of Rome, Italy. The Baron was an officer in the Italian Navy prior to his connection with the film industry, and is generally known as one of the controlling factors of the film destinies of all Europe. Baron Fassini is the man who made "Quo Vadis" possible.

PROJECTION BY REFLECTION

WHEN the efforts that are being made both in Europe and the United States to teach the correct principles of the science of motion picture making have borne fruit, it will, we hope, not be necessary to write such an article as this. It is the first of two or three to be devoted to the main subject. And it is necessary to glance at the history of optical projection in general in order that that which follows in subsequent numbers of The Motion Picture News may be made clear.

The motion picture as we have it today is an admitted development of what is known as "still" photography. If Daguerre and Fox Talbot, the pioneers, had never made photographs on silver and paper in the years 1839 and 1840, there would not have been any motion pictures today. These two men, to whom monuments have been erected on both sides of the Atlantic, may be regarded as the real founders of the animated photograph or motion picture.

The principle of the formation of images by reflection, for that is what this matter comes to, is older than photography. Telescopes are divided into refractors and reflectors. You can point the object glass of your refractor telescope at the sky and obtain an image of the stars either upon your retina or upon your photographic plate. Similarly, you can point the highly polished surface in your telescope tube to the sky and get an image there which can be reflected to your retina or to the photographic plate. So much for reflection as a fundamental basis for getting images of objects external to a telescope.

Now as to projection by reflection. One of the oldest methods of projection by reflection is that known as the aphengescope. Here you don't need either a lens or an object glass. Your object is placed angularly to your illuminant and the light reflects the object on to the screen. In this way you can show the face of a watch or the works in motion. This system was at one time known as the dark lantern or megascope.

When you see a small boy with a mirror in his hand making a disk of the sun shine in your face, he illustrates, more or less unconsciously, the fundamental principle that we are to bring to notice here. What he does is to project an image of light rays on to a receiving surface. It may be the wall or your clothing. The principle is the same as adopted in telescope.

Yet, will it be believed that several persons have in print denied that this principle could be availed of in motion picture projection? No less an authority than our illustrious predecessor in the editorial chair of this journal denied that this could be done. Also a certain writer in motion picture publication has rendered himself conspicuous by also denying the obvious.

It is not generally known that photographers, those who make photographs in studios, can make pictures of their sitters by reflection. The sitter is posed in the axis of a mirror and a photograph taken of the reflected image. This gives great softness to the resulting picture. It is too much the fashion amongst uneducated entrants into any field of endeavor to assume in their ignorance that which their limited intelligence permits them to comprehend is finality. Their philosophy seems to be whatever is best and nothing else is possible.

It might surprise some of these persons who unfortunately are found in the motion picture field to be told that not only can the principle of reflection be availed of in showing motion pictures, but you need not use celluloid films for making the pictures. Paper can be used; so can glass. More recently, the possibility of motion picture hand cameras was denied. They are in actual successful use.

It is impossible to calculate the extent to which the art and industry has been retarded by the misleading statements of the ignorant people who have been allowed to write on the subject.

FRANCESCA BERTINI

This is a splendid likeness of that beautiful and talented Italian actress, Miss Francesca Bertini, who plays the lead in "Venomous Tongues," the first Kleine-Celio release for Tuesday, December 2. Miss Bertini formerly was one of the Cines leads.

Motion Pictures of Clouds

The World Above on the Screen

AS we were writing the article on tele-photography, which was printed in The Motion Picture News of November the 22nd, an ardent young motion picture photographer called upon us with a strip of film, which illustrated in practical form our theory that the motion picture can be used, as it were, to annihilate space. In other words, that you can use your motion picture camera to make films of very distant objects, which when you see them on the screen will both delight and interest you.

The strip of film showed pictures of clouds. In the world of nature nothing is more beautiful than a mass of cloud forms. Clouds are just vapor or water in what you might call the state or condition of steam. These clouds take various forms: cirrus, cumulus, tumuli, "mackerel back" and others. The study of cloud forms is in itself a fascinating branch of science, well worth the attention of observers of natural history. Then, there are storm clouds—in fact, the forms of clouds that are understood and classified are numerous.

Now when these beautiful masses of vapor are seen in the sky, lit up by the rays of the sun, it is a common aspiration on the part of artists and others to reproduce them in paintings, oil and water color. Photographers like to get them in their photographs. And when to the beauty of the clouds, you add the fact that frequently they have motion and very rapid motion, you can see that they form fit subjects for the motion picture camera.

The procedure adopted in taking cloud pictures does not differ much from that used in making them with the still camera. You just point your camera to the cloud, use a very small stop or diaphragm in the lens and give as long an exposure as you possibly can. Of course, the nearer the clouds the better. The main idea is to secure beautiful masses, showing motion. When you get such a picture on the screen, it invariably interests everybody.

Some years ago, a photographer of our acquaintance took a whole series of still photographs, showing the life history of a series of cluods. You can trace the actual formation, growth, and as it were, the career of a cloud by means of photographs. Motion pictures of such subjects of this kind should be popular. Of course, they may have been made or attempted. If they have not this hint may be of value to those who want to get away from the "usual thing" in the motion picture news.

The "Pay-as-You-Enter" Man

(Essanay)

AT times this will make you laugh, and then again you will feel a lump rising in your throat. The efforts of Henry Rosser, a commuter, to provide a turkey for his young and healthy family for the holiday touches a humorous and touching note. The zeal with which he tries to win a turkey at a raffle and after he has secured it to have it all but whisked from his possession by the machinations of the law. Richard C. Travers, as Henry Rosser, the commuter, bears the brunt of this production.

Mr. Travers shows up strongly in this production, playing the role of a small-salaried clerk who is endeavoring to buy a home and at the same time provide the necessities for his family and pretty wife. He acts with a natural earnestness that is not strained; he conducts himself in keeping with the part. While Irene Warfield as the wife has not a lengthy role, that portion which is assigned to her is played convincingly. It would be the tendency of too many actors to play this part with too much ease or too much action in an effort to get something big out of it. Miss Warfield's playing, however, made it stand out as something really worth while. She portrayed the patient and economical wife with a nicety that caused the acting of Mr. Travers in his moments to please his family to be more appreciated. These two persons in a two-character production, where either one or the other or both are on view for the entire thousand feet of film, would be very much worth while.

The story, briefly told, relates the effort of Henry Rosser, a clerk in a large department store, where he has been employed for twenty years earning a salary of twenty dollars a week with which he is raising a family and at the same time buying a home in the suburbs, which he reaches from the city by train, street car and a half-mile walk. The effects used by the producer in showing night scenes of the suburban home are splendid. The children waiting at the gate with a lighted lantern and the glow of the window falling on them makes a beautiful picture.

The children look forward to the holiday with anticipation and pleasure, but the father does not know where the turkey is coming from. While on his way home on the eve of the holiday, he accidently meets a friend, with a turkey, who explains to him that he won. Henry enters the saloon, takes a chance on the next raffle and wins. His happiness, however, is short-lived as at this moment the police enter and arrest the proprietor for running a lottery. Henry is taken along as a witness. Not having sufficient money to offer as bail, he is thrust into a cell. Neither has he sufficient money to wire his wife of his predicament.

Henry takes a long chance and has a friend call on his employer, whom he does not know. Much to his surprise, Mr. Straussman, his employer, does bail him out and also gives him fifty dollars and tells him that he will see that his salary is substantially raised. He reaches home, where his wife is sitting up, awaiting him with the hard-earned turkey. This turkey is not sacrificed for the festive day, but is kept as a lucky omen, and another one, purchased with the money given him, is offered on the day of Thanks. C. J. V.

AFTER EXCLUSIVE PROGRAM

John I. Pittman, of Atlanta, Ga., and E. T. Peter, of Dallas, Texas, are in negotiation for the exclusive program in part for the Southern states, including Texas and Southern Oklahoma. Mr. Peter's company, the Texas Film Corporation, would control the states west of the Mississippi. This arrangement would not conflict with the contract with the Big Four Feature Corporation of Dallas which controls territorial rights on Itala, Solax, Great Northern, Gaumont and Blache American.

SCENE FROM "PAY-AS-YOU-ENTER" MAN

"H A R R Y"

Otherwise the President of the All Star

PARAPHRASING Fenimore Cooper, "It was towards the close of a hot and broiling day in July when two figures might have been seen tramping across the landscape"—of Maryland. The figures were H. R. R. and the writer. We were talking motion pictures. This was a few years ago, and we are still talking motion pictures. Harry Raver has realized his ambition. He is at the head of a great organization, the All Star Feature Corporation, putting out great pictures. That was what he wanted to do when we were having this heart-to-heart talk on a Sunday, near Chesapeake Bay, which neither of us will ever forget.

My! but we had a terrible tramp. When we got near the bay, there was "water, water everywhere, but not a drop to drink." The agonies that I endured found expression. But Harry smiled as Harry always does.

Before that, Raver had been in the business in the perfunctory way in which many prominent film men have had to graduate. Harry had had his vicissitudes before and has had them since, but as I can testify, he has always kept his goal in view. He wanted to be a picture man. On the occasion of that trip, we both looked over an ideal plant out at Du Pont Park, Baltimore, for the purpose, but the organization controlling the plant "went up." But still Harry stuck, through the Film Supply Company, the Itala Company, and other helpful rungs to success, and eighteen months ago conceived the All Star idea.

CAUGHT UNAWARES

The subject of this sketch is practical. He can make a picture—that is to say, by training and mental government he can supervise the work, and when that work is finished, he can analyze it, as only an innate artist can. He is a severe self-critic—which is about the best asset a motion picture maker can have.

An occasional acquaintance of H. R. wouldn't suspect this. He exudes the impression that he is an indifferentist, a casualist, a dilettante, but Harry in this picture business is sincere. Then he is young.

There was once a youthful statesman in Europe, who was taunted with his youth. In his reply, the statesman said that time would help him eradicate the fault. It is the same with H. R. R. He has only to stick to the part he has chosen to achieve even greater successes.

The show business gave Harry his earlier experience and, as the show business always does, it humanized him and made him feel for others. He is good-hearted.

He has achieved his laudable ambition of creating an ideal environment for himself. The association with such a man as Augustus Thomas and the other fine dramatic minds whose names are household words has had a singularly mellow effect upon Harry. Only yesterday, in the stormy days of the Sales Company, he was inclined to be quite a rebel. Now, he is getting conservative in his methods. Also he has dropped into a chosen haunt of respectability, Riverside Drive.

Mr. Raver has really a very wide circle of friends and acquaintances in all parts of the world who wish him success.

It is illustrative of Harry's determination of character that he engineered his All Star enterprise in the face of great difficulties and discouragements among his associates in the business. He has grit of the best kind, which is simply a determination to succeed in a good object, at all costs.

He is of the character of men we are better for having known, a prince of good fellows. Known in the entire industry as one of the best throughout judges of character and thoroughly familiar with all details of the film game, Harry has made good in his chosen line, and the progress of the All Star productions are a fitting evidence of his foresight and business acumen.

H. R. R. is quite an unsuspecting occupant of this gallery of portraits. But I have no hesitation in saying that I think the sketch of him is as near the truth of outline as it can be made by the aid of dispassionate thought and analysis. To come down from highbrowism, Harry Raver is a right good fellow—and Joseph White Farnham is his prophet. Allah be praised!

THE MOTION PICTURE NEWS IN EUROPE

THE exchange motion picture publications that we are receiving from Europe, reveal the fact that this paper is carefully read there. Extracts from our pages are of common occurrence. The French motion picture publication, Le Cineman, briefly synopsizes the article that we printed recently entitled "Motion Pictures by Wireless." This article has also been commented upon in several English publications. One of the latter, the Film Censor, constantly reproduces articles from these pages, with favorable comment. Our views on the condition of the industry in this country are given prominence and anything of a suggestable nature, such as the proposed motion picture society or institute, excites attention.

The Motion Picture News is clearly considered in Europe as the representative American publication. It circulates largely amongst renters and exhibitors there for whom the information about forthcoming American releases as advertised in these pages, is of practical value.

TREND OF MOTION PICTURES

THERE are two educational instruments operative in the world to-day that might and should be made to exert an influence for good almost equal to that exerted by the common school or the press. One of these is the phonograph, the other is the motion picture. Every observant person must be impressed with the possibilities of both, and it is only fair to say that the former is largely in the hands of people who are employing its influence to worthy purposes.

The motion picture is a commercial proposition almost exclusively. Its patron is the public. Its promoters are, generally speaking, desirous, first of all, of attracting the public. The elevation of public taste has not been regarded by them as any part of their mission. It has been necessary for municipalities to censor their productions.

The trend among film producers is toward cleaner, better presentations. This is encouraging. It is encouraging, too, to find that nothing is said in this connection about "giving the public what it wants." The public can be educated to "want" things it should not have. It ought to be taught by self-respecting public exhibitors to want things it ought to have. This, indeed, is not only essential to the morals of the public but to the permanent welfare of the motion picture business. The motion picture would soon cease to be an attraction save for a very small element of society, and that the most degraded, if the downward educational process were pursued; only by reversing this process and lifting the exhibitions constantly to higher levels can they be made a stable form of public entertainment. As such they can be, and, as already said, they should be, made to exert a tremendous educational influence for good.—Christian Science Monitor.

AMERICAN MOTION PICTURES IN PARIS

THE progress of the motion picture in France, according to our information, has not kept pace with its progress elsewhere. We are glad to perceive, therefore, that the dreadful "inertia," of which complaint has been made, has been lifted. American film manufacturers should take note of the statement that the pick of the world's market is still, perhaps, not yet offered to Paris.

According to our French contemporaries this is only too true, as we do not see American films advertised there to the same extent as in Germany, the British Isles, and elsewhere. And yet American products and people are immensely popular in Paris. And interesting to tell, American people, or rather that section of the American public which travels in Europe, prefers Paris to Anglo-Saxon London. There is something in the Gallic temperament which harmonizes more readily with the American temperament than does the Anglo-Saxon.

In this state of affairs we would think it wise of American film manufacturers to cultivate, if possible, the French market direct. By what we read, the demand for American pictures there is only just about to commence.

A great daily paper, Le Journal, published in Paris, now has its Cinema page. This is described as the most ambitious piece of the motion picture journalistic work that has yet been presented to the Paris public.

OH, IT'S AN INTERESTING LIFE!

Punctuated by GEORGE D. PROCTOR

AMONG the gratifying signs of the times is the invasion of the "legitimate" theatres of New York by motion pictures. Klaw & Erlanger will put feature pictures in the New Amsterdam Theatre, their pet house, every afternoon except on matinee days, and on Sunday nights. The first picture to be shown is "The Life of Wagner," produced by the Messter Film of Germany With this goes special organ music and a lecturer. The whole gives a vivid, lasting impression of the turbulent career of the great musician. As an educational it is wonderful.

Next come the Shuberts. Last Sunday night they gave over the Hippodrome to William A. Brady's pictures of the revolution in Mexico. Pictures will replace the Sunday night band concert at the Hippodrome from now on. Brady will show his Mexican war pictures at his Playhouse whenever possible without conflicting with "The Family Cupboard."

"How Wild Animals Live," a six-part film brought over by Midgar Features, is doing good business at Carnegie Lyceum twice daily. The two versions of "The Last Days of Pompeii" continue to do good business on Broadway; Kleine's at the Bijou, and the Pasquali production at the Park. At the Berkeley Theatre "The Boy and the Law" is being shown twice daily.

The utilization of their crack theatres by K. & E. and the Shuberts to show motion pictures during the spare moments is the entering wedge. It will go further because they are planning to show the right kind of pictures. To show program stuff would be foolish. But big pictures, real features, and educational subjects, in short, the kind of films in which every one who looks ahead rejoices, when shown in big legitimate houses, will do much toward making converts to motion pictures and for the general advancement of the business.

From a business standpoint the proposition is beautiful in its simplicity. A man has a big picture on his hands and an empty theatre. He combines the two and that's all there is to it. Right now the thing is in the experimental stage. But I don't see how it's going to lose It utilizes time which otherwise would go to waste. It's good business for the theatrical managers, of course, but it also is good for the pictures. If the thing works out well all the legitimate theatres which can get pictures of sufficient merit will show them in the same way. Fine.

Charles "Feature" Abrams refuses to be quiet. Bryan's greatest rival off the Chatauqua platform now has another string to his bow besides the

"FEATURE" IS HIS MIDDLE NAME

Great Northern Special Features. Up on the tenth floor of our own Candler Building he has an office which will be the home of the Films Lloyds, Inc., and the Photo-Drama Company. This latter must not be confused with the George Kleine Corporation by the same name. The Films Lloyds, Inc., will do a general film brokerage business.

The first picture of the Photo-Drama Company will be a five-part version of "Ten Nights in a Bar Room." Charlie gave a private exhibition of this picture Wednesday. It looks like a sure-fire, financially, to me. The subject is well known and the production is good. With it Charlie is off to a flying start. I was going to tell who the Abrams person is, but what's the use. He's been selling films and hypnotizing state rights buyers too long to need that. More later about the film.

A fight between moving picture producers and authors involving the validity of book copyrights may yet reach the United States Supreme Court, according to the threat of the Authors' League of America, which may be found at 30 Broad street, New York.

All this comes through the litigation over the film productions of Jack London's stories. The Balboa Amusement Company drew blood recently in California when the Federal Court in Los Angeles refused to grant an injunction against Balboa at the request of Jack London and Bosworth, Inc. This injunction would have applied to "The Sea Wolf," of which H. M. Horkheimer, general manager of Balboa, has a three-part production, while Bosworth, Inc., has a seven-part production. Horkheimer is said to be planning to sue Bosworth, Inc., for damages.

Now enters the Authors' League. The court ruled against London and Bosworth, but gave them right to reopen the case. The Authors' League says it will take up London's fight and carry it to the United States Supreme Court if necessary.

This Saturday is set apart for formal opening of the new quarters of the Screen Club at 165 West Forty-seventh street. It's foolish to predict, so I'll let the story go till next week, but this one thing I know—they'll all be there.

William Frederick Haddock, "Silent Bill," is now a married man. He and Rosa Koch were wedded quietly Wednesday night. This means a lot to me. Only a dozen or so gathered at the church, and I stood up with Bill. A good friend of mine has now acquired for himself greater happiness. I needn't say more. They and everybody else know how I feel. I couldn't say any more, anyway, without brimming over.

John E. Hardin will soon sever his connection with the Edison Company to become sales manager for the Ambrosio American Company for the United States and Canada. John has been with the Edison Company for nine years. His position with them has been most agreeable to him in every way, but he sees great opportunities in his new position.

Just to show how folks feel about the Hardin person, a high official in the Patents Company said, "We hate to see him go, but he's bettering himself and we all wish him well." That comes from headquarters.

W. I. Cherry, of the Southern Feature Film Program Association, is in town for a few days on business. His concern plans to cover the eleven Southern states with offices in Atlanta, Ga., Oklahoma, Arkansas and New Orleans, La., in addition to its present office in Dallas. It handles the products of the Famous Players Film Company, the All Star Feature Corporation, and other meritorious pictures.

Mr. Cherry states that the Southern Feature Film Program Association has been completely reorganized. He has bought out the others who were formerly interested in it, and the capital stock has been increased from $35,000 to $100,000 cash paid in.

Augustus Thomas has just received a tribute that is rare even among the men of letters of the country. At the meeting in Chicago of the American Academy and the National Institute of Arts and Letters, he was awarded a gold medal as the man who had achieved the most in the drama during the last five years. This august organization only meets once in ten years and its awards are most highly prized.

The Anderson Gaiety Company, in which "Broncho Billy" is the moving spirit, will take over the new Strand Theatre, now in course of construction at Broadway and Forty-seventh street. It will give musical comedies for a dollar. This policy is now being followed by the same company with great success in San Francisco.

Nell Shipman, scenario expert, is trying a new scheme that sounds good. She will write scripts on order from manufacturers after receiving data as to them, length of picture, the personnel of the company, the director's wants, and so on. She has quit freelancing, with the exception of some orders on hand for James K. Hackett, Nance O'Neil, and other celebrities.

Entre Nous, Messieurs

"Arrest this man." This startling caption heads a communication Watterson R. Rothacker, of Chicago, general manager of the Industrial Moving Picture Company, is sending around. Further remarks are: "If you see this man in your vicinity arrest him long enough to hear his story. Put him through the third degree on motion picture advertising. It will pay you and you will be liberally rewarded." A reward of one thousand dollars is offered if you catch him unable to make good.

Jack Noble, the original, undiluted Jazbo from Yom Kippur Valley, has left Ramo. He is putting on a picture for the Fair Feature Film Company which will be an exposition of the New York police and prison system. The necessary permits have been obtained.

Ed Kaufman, press agent, has left Ryno.

Hopp Hadley is now down with Phil Mindil in the publicity department of the Mutual Film Corporation at 71 West Twenty-third street.

Daniel Frohman and Harrison Grey Fiske gave a private showing recently of Mrs. Fiske in the Famous Players production, "Tess of the D'Urbervilles."

Harry A. Samwick, of the Exclusive Features, Inc., of New York City, took a flying trip last week to Syracuse, where he recently opened an office for the handling of state right features.

David W. (Larry) Griffith is certainly gathering his forces around him at the Reliance studio, at 262d street and Riverdale avenue. A new studio is being equipped, it is reported, at Sixteenth street and Broadway, and the plan is to have ten directors working. William C. Cabanne, Eugene Sanger, Edgar Lewis, Carl Le Viness, Travers Vale and George Reehm are now at work. Eddie Dillon and James Kirkwood will soon be on the job.

Billy Bitzer, a camera man of considerable repute, has gone with Griffith. Among the players the latest are Mae Marsh, Courtenay Foote, formerly of the Vitagraph; Robert Harron, Donald Crisp, Fred and Robert Burns, Eagle Eye and Mazie Star.

The new Reliance studio at 262d street and Riverdale avenue, will be christened by a dance Saturday evening, November 29.

Jack Cohen, assembler and titler at the Imp studio, where he is the oldest employee in point of years of service, having been with that firm since it started, is going over to Biograph.

A son has been born to Ben Wilson and Jessie McAllister, of the Edison players. He will be named Ben, Jr.

George Terwilliger's medicine practice in Fort Dodge, Iowa, a few years ago was very useful the other day in aiding Earl Metcalfe, who was injured during the filming of a Lubin photoplay. The Shakespeare of the silent drama ordered his patient taken to his office in the scenario department, where, with the assistance of Lawrence S. McCloskey and Nurse M. B. Havey, he applied restoratives. In a few moments Metcalfe was brought to. Upon the young physician's orders, Eminent Campbell Hall took the patient in his motor to a nearby hospital, where it was discovered that, had it not been for Terwilliger's prompt action, the young Lubin actor would have been a splendid case for the local physician.

Burton W. Garrett, private secretary to William H. Swanson when the latter was secretary of the Universal, is on a trip through the Middle West in the interest of Blache features and Solax features.

Bert Angeles is the director responsible for the four-reel Pilot production, "Across the Continent."

James Gordon, who is producing "Hoodman Blind" at the Pilot studio, alleges that Bill Haddock stole his grease paint when Bill was up there taking some scenes for "Soldiers of Fortune" for the All Star. Oh, who cares, anyway?

Winnifred Greenwood, leading woman with the American Film Company, has been granted an Indiana divorce from Frederick Bannister, a stock actor. The judge imposed the restriction that she must not remarry within two years.

Fred Mace and his comedy company have returned to the New Majestic studio near Los Angeles. In the company are Marguerite Loveridge, Bud Duncan, Harry Edwards and George W. Peters, camera man.

Arthur S. Abeles, of the Sedeg Feature Film Company, has just returned from Buffalo, where he has located a new Sedeg branch. Joseph A. Davis will be the manager.

The Sedeg Feature Film Company has obtained the New York state rights for Gaumont features.

"Whaddye mean you lost your dog?" A lady visited the Kinemacolor offices at 1600 Broadway, take it from Willard Holcomb, to see her dog on the screen.

Marc MacDermott, leading man with the Edison Company in England, recently sustained bad bruises when thrown from the back of an ill-tempered horse.

FOR THOSE WHO WORRY O'ER PLOTS AND PLAYS

WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT

MISS Maibelle Heikes Justice, of New York and Chicago, jousted into Filmland only a few months ago, immediately broke a lance or two against the shields of Essanay and Selig, and won the tourney. Since that time she has been writing the big, gripping, melodramatic multiples that have aided in making the Western Film concerns famous. Miss Justice is equally at home marketing fiction or motion picture plays. Her stories have appeared in almost all of the popular magazines. Her short novel "The Other Man," which appeared in Cosmopolitan, has been dramatized. Her latest novel, "The Velvet Glove," appeared recently in the London edition of "The Smart Set" and will appear in the American edition soon—so the author will have a double publication which is not a common occurrence.

Miss Justice' career is just another substantiation of the argument that the newspaper office is the best school in the world for the literarily inclined. Daughter of the late James Monroe Justice, of Indiana, she admits the advantage of having been born in the Literary Belt, along with Ade, Nicholeson, Tarkington, Riley, and all the rest, but she also gives due credit to the schooling derived from newspaper work.

Miss Justice was educated in New York City, and before she was twenty years of age, she was writing full-page special articles for the New York Sun, and later for the Herald. Then, like George Ade, Irvin Cobb, George Randolph Chester, et al., the journalistic training emerged into fiction work, and also picture-play writing.

Local Color in Northwest

Miss Justice recently returned from the Northwest where she dabbled in local color and sent down to Chicago some bully good scripts with far north plots that have heretofore been favored by Jack London and Rex Beach. "Etienne, of the Glad Heart," written in the Northland this Fall will soon be released by the Selig Company. It was written "right on the ground," fearlessly and honestly, and depicts the strong love, deep passions, and wild hatreds of Northern frontiersmen, and yet possesses the tender understrain of heart interest a field in which Miss Justice is unusually adept. "The Pay-as-You-Enter Man," put in production by Essanay Company the same day the script arrived and to be released as a Thanksgiving number, is a two-reel adaptation by Miss Justice of her story of the same name that appeared in Munsey's Magazine.

This little woman is a realist in all she does. She digs a way down underneath and endeavors to get the truth out of life. Her rapid advancement in the picture-play field is due to an absence of egotism, an unusual talent, great industry, and to the fact that she is appreciative. She rightly appreciates the treatment she has received from the Selig and Essanay companies and waxes enthusiastic over their courtesies and kindnesses. Her name as author now appears on all her work produced by Selig. Miss Justice likes to see others succeed and she contributes an article for the benefit of our readers this week entitled "From An Author's Standpoint." It follows:

"Inspiration, System and Habit"

"In the writing of either fiction or photoplay I cannot see any great difference. The plots can be identically the same. The difference is only in manner of treatment which, of course, is distinctly diametrical. In the one, the author has his imagination and as much of the English language he wishes to draw upon for narrative, description, and dialogue—juggling with the English language I sometimes call it, for it is certainly a feat to be acquired with practice and experience, while in the photoplay the dramatist must have vivid imagination, the art to gauge that imagination down to a nutshell, then divide it tersely, concisely, telegraphically almost, into scenes which must indicate action only. I believe when more scenario writers can shut their eyes and visualize their story, their scenes in a panorama of action, rather than to 'think it out' descriptively, that there will be many better photoplays. But back of it all there must be inspiration.

"Authors have contended to me that there is no such thing as inspiration but don't you believe it. There is, and it has to come from within. This is one reason why I cannot take a plot offered by some one else and evolve it into either story or photoplay. That plot has been superficial and never wholly 'in my system' and what does not come from within, I never can be wholly in accord with. Other writers have told me they experience the same feeling. Naturally, however, over and beyond inspiration, we must grind a good deal in order to turn out good work—and I find the morning hours the best for writing, usually from 9 until 1 o'clock. So let us say we must have inspiration, system, and habit in order to accomplish our best.

"But as that delightful author, O. Henry, used to say: 'The onion is the soul of the soup,' so is the plot the soul of our story or photoplay. But plots are growing to mean more and more—there aren't any. Yet, without plot, we cannot write. So, for this reason the field for the photoplay entrant is very much more difficult now than it was a few years ago. Fiction standard has not varied much, but novelty is always the cry of the film manufacturer.

"Greater rewards are in store for the good scenario writer though publicly expressed appreciation of his work will be his greatest stimulus—this is screen and poster credit. I have no doubt whatsoever, but that the advent of the fiction writer has brought much of the change about. In the first place, he has been trained from the beginning to have his fiction signed in the magazines—credit gladly given by the publishers. Now that he has entered the film game, and if he is making good, that is, trying to write acceptable work, he's not over delighted to find his identity snuffed into oblivion as he sees his play wound off the reel. I do not know of one author I have talked to but what would like to see some of his work in pictures. In fact, personally, I had to hold up the fiction writing awhile consistently and conscientiously to master the photoplay

"Have Idea of Production"

"Competition is so rife nowadays, that nothing but real effort will stand the test. But, questioned about screen and poster credit, I am sure every author who is not ashamed to see a poor play run on the screen, because of his name and reputation, will say 'yes.' And in the same way I feel that the regular scenario writer who has not literary reputation, but who has written up to the standard, should have the same screen recognition. All are working for the same result—success. And shekels—some will say. But don't let the latter idea bother you until you are sure you can write something worth shekels.

"But of all things try and 'see' your picture on the screen as you write. Write with some idea of production and don't leave a lot of tedious annoyances for the producer to overcome. Have your story in mind and first decide if it's big enough for a multiple—or only a single. Then make your story probable and real. There's enough in real life to depict, wherever your environment may be, without going into the clouds. So ring true. Truth will always give heart interest. Having your story well in hand, evolve it then, scene by scene—work gradually upward in interest and intensity until you reach the 'high light' as I call it—but 'punch' or 'climax' or whatever you will—it has to be there.

"For as the musician works up to his crescendo, or the artist for his point of relief in his canvas, in your photoplay you must lead your audience safely and consistently over the climax you have led it to expect when your story opens. Don't be ashamed to acknowledge you know nothing about technique when you begin. If it is ever your good fortune to meet and talk with editors and directors, listen to and absorb everything they have to say. Asked for closer details, my plays, comedy or drama, all run not less than thirty scenes to a reel, seldom more.

"The synopsis is kept as short as possible—yet not within three hundred and fifty words, and the story fully given—with its climax cited—so that the director knows exactly what he is reading before he begins the play. I don't number scripts in scenes at the side. I number them down through the center above each scene. All my titles and inserts are written wholly in capitals, indicating that all capital letters are to be thrown on the screen. On the title page of my plays I enumerate my characters following with the exteriors and interiors numbered according to stage-sets. My characters are named as 'human beings.' I write my scene matter fully but as economically in adjectives as possible Spelled in one nowadays, scenario writing means hard word—and hustle."

The Vital Punch

E. M. Wickes undertakes to explain the meaning of the photoplay punch. He publishes a list of solutions from authorities who endeavor to explain the "punch with a spike in it." The punch in a photoplay is really unexplainable, but Wickes, in desperation, delved into life's dictionary and uncovered this: "A punch is hypnotism and magnetism combined—the something in all objects, animate or inanimate, that demands attention. It makes us forget our surroundings, steals our attention and forces us to think, hope, fear, cry or laugh. It may be a surprise, but it must be a natural surprise, the logical effect of a certain cause. Punch may be nerve-racking suspense without the sudden twist—the suspense resulting from acts that are ever subject to change."

Before or After?

We are receiving many inquiries as to the placing of the cast of characters. Shall we write the cast before or after the synopsis? seems a vital question to many beginners. Really, it is a small matter. One authority, for instance, advises using the cast following the synopsis. Our habit is just the contrary. We think it improves the appearance of the script to follow title with cast of characters and then the synopsis. If you write the properly-prepared script the cast will be short and the synopsis will be short. Hence all can be placed on the first page of the script.

Questions Answered

Are photoplays ever carefully read and accepted if not typewritten? They are not.

What is a melodrama? A melodrama is the plot in which the greaser runs amuck with the bowie knife and is finally slaughtered by the brave sheriff. Red blood and thrills is another definition.

Can a beginner start to write two-reel stories before selling one-reel stories? Sure; can start to write anything. However, it is far better to learn to walk before endeavoring to run. It is essential that you write the single-reel story acceptably before embarking on the more pretentious effort. There is, or should be, twice as much story in the two-reel than one-reel effort.

Is it a good policy to have "visions" in a play? It is not. They please motion picture theatre patrons, but they do not please the editor. If you wish to market your work, avoid trick effects.

Is this theme hackneyed? "A young man leaves the farm and his sweetheart behind him and goes to the city——" Say no more Pauline; that leaving the farm plot had sideburns when Methuselah was three years of age.

Have you a list of old plots, and one of those plots fresh and desirable? We have a long list of old plots. Those we deem fresh and desirable we send away from here as soon as possible.

The Hall of Fame

Roy L. McCardell, pioneer scriptwriter, is preparing plots for the Weber & Fields pictures.

Richard Willis has been commissioned to write a series of photoplays for Venus Features.

It is stated that King Baggott will hereafter direct many of the pictures in which he takes the lead.

Forms of Rejection

We sympathize with our friends when they object to present forms of rejection slips. The checked form of rejection is frequently misleading, but at that it is not as bad as the rejection which is sent out to the impossible writer telling him that "we regret that the enclosed is not available to our present needs. However, this does not mean that your story is not meritorious, etc., etc." There should be a rejection form telling a certain class of writers that "we are of the opinion that it is useless for you to try to write photoplays." Very often such advice would do the misguided one a kindness and aid in clearing the market of impossible "masterpieces."

Her Strongest Point

An Atlanta, Ga., young lady writes that her strongest point in scriptwriting is the art of visualizing. She says when a plot comes it is worked out in her mind with actual characters from start to finish before a word is put on paper. "So far as I am concerned that film has actually been acted before my eyes with real people, and I move those people through every detail of every scene over and over again until the whole thing is smooth and complete. Then I sit down and write it and cannot put down the words fast enough. Two solid years of 'comebacks' hasn't dimmed my enthusiasm in the least, but in that time I have written but twenty scripts and have plenty of time yet to fail or succeed." Here is a young lady who has labored for two years and is not discouraged. This young lady's knack of visualization is a qualification that is to be envied. Her talent should be cultivated by others—also her persistence.

Glad to Hear from You

I HAVE on my desk a very neat little blotter. Its size is about three by six inches. It is of a glazed buff color with some red margins and reads as follows:

SAXE THEATRE
Frank Cook, Manager.
Music under the direction of N. Lubovitzki

   "A Watersoaked Hero."

COMING: Wednesday and Thursday, Nov. 12-13
"WHEN THE EARTH TREMBLED"
A Story of the San Francisco Earthquake. A Lubin Feature in Three Parts.

This little blotter is one of the neatest programmes I have seen for a very long time. It is well printed, very neat in appearance, in other words, it is a refined card that will escape the fate of so many advertising sheets—the waste basket.

Pictures so neatly advertised can not be but good.

The beauty of this little blotter is that even the most refined woman is not ashamed to be seen in the street with a copy in her hands.

Many exhibitors are wasting much money in using too cheap printing and too low a grade of paper. No one wishes to carry home common circulars.

Visits Eagle Frame Company

While in Chicago, I visited the factory of the Eagle Frame Company and I was surprised to find such a large stock of the most varied frames for the display of posters and of photographs. Joseph Guercio, the manager, is of an inventive turn and creates new models daily. To tell the truth, Guercio is a man with some experience and he has gained his practical experience in the show business. As an exhibitor he has found all the draw backs of many poster frames. One claim of Guercio is:

"Experience has taught us that frames opening from the front on hinges, like the Eagle frames, fasten the poster more securely, give them a smoother surface and improve their appearance."

The new 1914 Catalogue D of the Eagle Frame Company at 506 N. Carpenter street, Chicago, Ill., gives numerous illustrations of their various styles of frames and easels. These frames and easels are finished in gloss mahogany, flat mahogany, black, dark green weathered oak, mission or any finish the exhibitor may desire to match with the wood or decorations of his lobby. The frames are all guaranteed well seasoned to stand any weather conditions.

With the great variety of posters, the manufacturers of frames have been overtaxed to build frames strong enough to hold the large six and eight sheet posters.

As I have often said before, the poster by itself is not always so objectionable, but the criticism on posters is due to the manner in which they are displayed.

In Milwaukee I have noticed a theatre which presented a mighty poor display, as two six sheet posters hanging by ropes were at the mercy of the wind. At the Alhambra Theatre, one of the Saxe houses, I found in the lobby a six sheet poster which had a very different appearance. The poster was mounted flat in a large frame made of a wide gilt moulding and a velvet mat. This large frame was hung against the wall and in front of it were grouped a number of plants in artistic vases. At a distance, the poster appeared as a large painting and had lost all the ugliness of a plain advertising sheet. While this frame is rather costly, the refined appearance of the lobby repays the investment.

Ten Cent Sale a Success

Ralph Tippitt, the manager of the Theatorium at 176 North State street, Chicago, is an enterprising young man, who after taking charge of a theatre that was not considered a very good investment, turned the ledger by showing an increased daily business.

Tippitt is ambitious; he does not rest on a first success and he studied a way to still increase the profits by raising the admission to ten cents. A rather risky proposition, at least in the opinion of many persons who do not believe the neighborhood is the proper one for an increase in the price of admission.

Tippitt, like all successful managers, does not stop to take the advice of every one but he makes his plans and sticks to his policy.

He started to secure some special feature films of real merit for two days of the week at ten cents, keeping his regular five cent programme for the balance of the week. Because Tippitt knew how to advertise, by adding some neatly painted show cards and calling the attention of his patrons to the fact he was showing a different line of pictures and was giving them full value, he made a success.

The experiment has proven so satisfactory that the ten cent days have been increased and in the near future the Theatorium will be a regular high admission photoplay house.

The experiment of Mr. Tippitt proves once more that the public does not object to a ten cent admission. In fact, many persons go by the price. Have two articles of the same quality and same value, quote one at one dollar and the other at seventy-five cents, and the chances are that you will sell more of the dollar articles than of the lower price, under the belief that as it costs twenty-five cents more it is of superior quality.

It is all in the way of advertising. If your lobby looks neat and refined the patrons have the impression that the pictures are of a higher grade. The lobby is much like the show window. It is not the amount of goods and signs that a storekeeper displays in his show windows that bring him the trade; it is the way such goods and signs are displayed.

Speed in Showing Pictures

While the Theatorium has not an ideal location for a ten cent admission, we must remember that the projection is excellent under the direct supervision of Al. Purcell, one of the best operators of Chicago. I doubt if the projection could be improved, but I feel confident that the pictures would be more pleasing if Mr. Tippitt was to run them at a lower speed.

It is not only necessary to improve the appearance of the lobby and to change pictures to justify the increased admission, but the manager must improve his show by running his films at a more normal speed.

PATHE "DUMMY" HALTS TRAINS

A story too good to be kept quiet has just leaked out about Fred Wright, the fat and jolly director for Pathé Frères.

A scenario upon which Mr. Wright was working required the chief character, a man of former wealth but degenerated into a cheap gambler, to jump from a bridge on to a passing freight train in order to escape from his pursuers.

Mr. Wright had it framed up to have a dummy do the actual jump, which was too hazardous for even the most nervy player. He found the proper setting at Haworth, N. J., on the West Shore railroad, and everything was in readiness for the expected freight.

But a West Shore through train butted in. While tearing along at a 40-mile gait the engineer, looking up, saw hanging over his head what was apparently a man in a most dangerous position. He jammed on all brakes and brought the train to a standstill, and Mr. Wright had a hard time making explanations to the angry train crew, who had also to listen to the laughter of the passengers. Finally they pulled out and left the field to Mr. Wright.

The freight came along as scheduled, but, to Mr. Wright's disgust, the same thing happened with the crew of the freight train.

By this time the train dispatchers at the offices of the railroad company were burning up the wires with lurid words, ordering their station agent at Haworth to get on the job and get rid of "those crazy moving-picture people."

Katherine Kerrigan, sister of Jack Kerrigan, has joined the forces at the Universal Pacific Coast studios. She will be Delilah in the coming production of "Samson and Delilah," while brother Jack will play Samson. Miss Kerrigan has been a popular leading woman with road companies for some time.

What's What in Washington, D. C.

DOWN in Washington, D. C., the outlook for the coming theatrical season is most roseate for the motion picture theatre. Every office is using the full quota of films issued by the manufacturers interested in his particular sales company. Features have become a demand and the number of reels for a single show of five cents is usually four, sometimes more. The desire on the part of exhibitors for first-run pictures is increasing, so that sometimes it is difficult to meet requirements. There is very little shifting from one exchange to another. Everybody seems satisfied with his service.

A few new houses have opened and others are in the course of erection. All managers are looking to the interest and accommodation of their patrons in light, ventilation, heat, music, and most of all, a careful selection of films.

The Washington Film Exchange, which handles the output of the Universal Company, finds its spacious new quarters none too large for the various departments which it handles. The poster service has especially been increased with a view of relieving the exhibitor as much as possible of this work. Here the lithographs are mounted and ornamented in a very attractive style. Closer attention is also paid to the condition of returned reels by a competent force.

When Manager C. W. Swain, of the General Film Company, was questioned about the outlook for the winter he was happy.

"I haven't enough reels to supply my patrons," he said, "though I am using our entire output, including features. I could use many more films if I had them. There is a great demand for comedy, more than the supply. The educational film is not as popular as has been expected, except when it is interwoven in an interesting photoplay. Only an exceptional scenic picture is enjoyed by the average patron of the motion picture, though these very same patrons will demand beautiful scenery as a background for a drama.

"Most of the picture-goers want to be entertained and amused without having instruction thrust upon them. At the same time they want the stories to teach some definite lesson. Another thing, the photoplay patrons want outdoor scenes. The day of studio scenes composing an entire drama is past. Painted scenery is the property of the legitimate stage: the motion picture must be nature. The features are being run in the ground by the exhibitor. I advise two a week and when my patrons take my advice they find their box-office receipts are larger per week than if they had a feature every day."

No matter how busy Manager Cunningham, of the Mutual Film Exchange, may be, he manages to squeeze in at least a few minutes for a visitor. Mutual first-runs are very popular in Washington, some of the houses giving an entire program of daily first-runs. The features of this exchange have displaced many of the foreign features that were used by some down-town theatres. The Mutual Exchange has gotten its share of the new theatres opening this fall.

The local office of Warner's Features has broadened its scope. Owing to the fact that a feature has become a part of the daily show of down-town theatres, the establishment of this exchange became a necessity. Questioning the winter outlook, the manager said: "We are using our entire output in this vicinity and could use more if there were more features of the desired standard to be handled. We use comparatively few of the foreign films now, because we can get better and ones more to the liking of the American public in this country. Except when it is a classic or a historical drama, the American manufacturer knows best how to satisfy his own countrymen. This condition is very pleasant and shows the wisdom of the American makers."

Notes

"Quo Vadis" could have a run of nearly two weeks at the Columbia Theatre, one of Washington's high-priced legitimate theatres, with standing room only all the time.

The production of the Famous Players Film Company are appearing at The Garden with crowded houses. James O'Neill in "The Count of Monte Cristo," received a big ovation recently.

"Les Miserables" was given its initial performance at the National Theatre, a home of first-class plays, in two performances on Sunday. A distinguished audience of dramatic critics, scholars, college professors, and social and official lights were present.

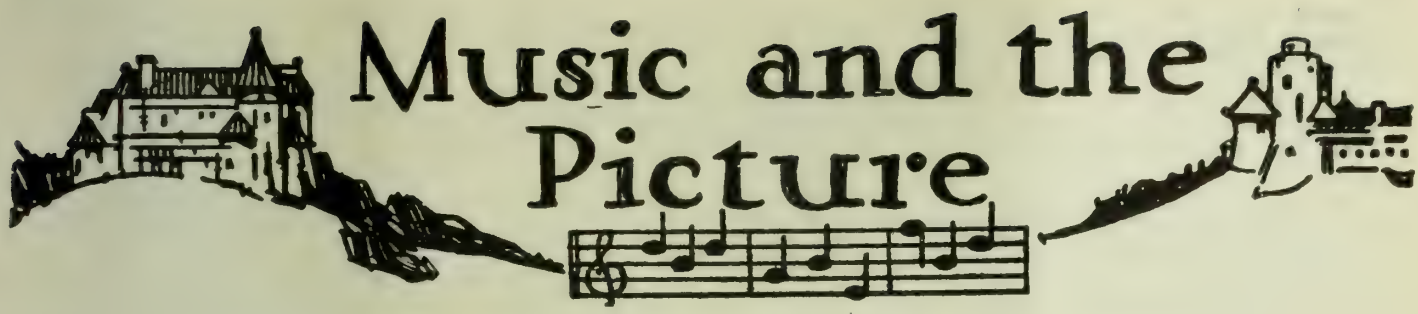
MANUFACTURERS' NOTE

There is to be a section devoted to motion picture materials at the Second Annual convention of the Photographic Dealers' Association of America, to be held at the Hotel Sherman, Chicago, Ill., March 24, 25, 26 and 27, 1914. Manufacturers of motion picture apparatus are invited to take part in the convention. Mr. Charles H. Huesgen, of 456 Fourth avenue, New York City, is president, and all communications should be addressed to him.



Suggestions Invited, Questions Cheerfully Answered

Address : Music Department, The Motion Picture News

SOME one wrote an essay on "Music for the Picture," and said: "Some persons appreciate good music. It is a profitable stunt to try and merit their appreciation."

What does the writer mean? Does he claim that to please a few lovers of grand opera, the orchestra should play the full overture of "Il Trovatore" during a fight between cowboys and Indians?

This writer encourages the exhibitor to follow the very wrong policy which has done so much to retard the prosperity of motion pictures, viz., to listen to fads and to act without good judgment.

When I reproached a manager for running his pictures too fast, he told me: "Some patrons who call during the noon hour and who have not much time, yet who want to enjoy the full show, request us to run the reels as fast as we can."

This is a foolish idea.

Any manager should have more common sense than to displease a whole audience, injure the eyesight of others, and give a poor reputation to his house to merely please a few selfish men who have only thirty minutes at the lunch hour to see pictures? Such a manager cannot make a success of his theatre. Reels run at a speed of ten minutes are hard on the eye and disgust the audience because there is no time to read the subtitles.

Large Screen Undesirable

Other exhibitors want a big screen because they have a few patrons with weak eyesight who insist in taking the last seats and who call for a large picture. This is another bit of foolishness. A picture loses much of its richness when it is magnified.

The same applies to the posters. Because some persons with a single nickel in their pocket ask to see all the posters before they can decide in which theatre they will spend the lone nickel, this abuse of posters which is a disgrace to our streets has arrived.

The patrons of a motion picture theatre are a good deal like shoppers. Then never know what they want and the hardest ones to please prove to be the most undesirable customers. We have too many of these time-killers, who visit the stores, bother the clerks, and walk out without making a purchase. We have them in the show business. They will stop in front of a theatre, argue on the posters, question the singers, question the music, make suggestions, and walk away without spending a nickel.

While I claim courtesy is a good policy, I do not think that it is wise to listen to everyone, as by so doing you please no one and you don't know where you stand. A theatre must have a well-defined policy and stick to it. It is impossible to please everyone, and this has been the great mistake of many of our exhibitors—to try to please all classes. Tastes are different. Try to please one class and try to make of this class your regular patronage.

I freely admit that we have had a number of persons who go to a motion picture as a mere pastime. They cannot enjoy a good story, clever acting, fine photography, appropriate music, but they like a rag time tune. If you want to please this class, you are sure to disgust the real lovers of motion pictures.

A Hard Question Discussed

I stated my experience at Mr Sievers' Grand Central Theatre in St. Louis, where the refined audience appreciated the excellent music and sound effects, so well timed with the actions depicted on the screen. This class of patrons would have been disgusted if, to please a few persons, the orchestra had struck a good jolly old song during the very pathetic scene of the man diving to rescue the little girl.

Mr. Sievers does not listen to wild advice. He caters to a certain class of lovers of motion pictures, and by sticking to his policy of appropriate music for the picture, he has made a name and a fortune. The ones who cannot appreciate a good picture and who call for much noise from the orchestra pit, do not visit the New Grand Central Theatre and Mr. Sievers does not care for their trade.

There is a question that should be settled once for all: "What is a motion picture theatre?"

Is it a place where pictures are shown as the main program with enough appropriate music to bring out the effects and enhance the beauty of the picture?

Is it a theatre where vaudeville is the special attraction with a few pictures sandwiched between the acts, while the stage hands prepare the scenery for the next scene?

Is it a concert hall where pictures are shown as a sort of intermission to give a rest to the musicians, or to act as a background to the orchestra?

I don't say that in course of time we will not have pictures produced to follow a musical composition, but the pictures of to-day are produced without any consideration to the incidental music. The producer is very attentive to see that the actors take the proper positions to ensure the best stage effects, but he does not stop to think that if he was to allow twenty-five or fifty more feet to the scene, he could help the music. The producer is an actor, he is not a musicion.

The real lovers of literature want to read "Les Miserables" of Victor Hugo, not to know what Jean Valjean is doing, but to read a well-written book. When they go to a photoplay house to see "Les Miserables," they do not go to enjoy a treat in literature. They go to see a succession of pictures depicting the principal feats of Jean Valjean. It is the same with music. Lovers of music will go season after season to hear "Faust," to enjoy some excellent music, to hear some great artists, and when they go to a motion picture theatre to see "Faust," it is not to enjoy the music but to see the wonderful motion pictures. While some special music has been prepared for "Faust" in motion pictures, it is no more grand opera, only short selections—too short to please the lovers of good music.

Why Not Music for the Picture?

If the photoplay house is a concert hall, you have to run the film at a too slow speed to follow the music, and if the theatre is a motion picture show, you have to cut too much of the music to follow the film.

The real lovers of music do not go to a picture show for a musical treat. They go to a concert. The same applies to lovers of good vaudeville, as they do not expect to find good acts in a five-cent motion picture theatre.

You never see real lovers of motion pictures go to a vaudeville theatre. They know that the films shown there are not of the best, are a sort of side line, and are not projected with the proper care. I made this idea last week when I showed that the great Talbot Hippodrome of St. Louis, with its long vaudeville show of two and a half hours did not take the lovers away from his neighbor, the Grand Central theatre of Mr. Sievers.

In a vaudeville house, the orchestra follows the act on the stage, as it is music prepared for the act. No one could induce the leader of the orchestra to disregard this music to play ragtime, a march or anything else to please a few certain patrons. Why should it be different with motion pictures?

In closing I will state that it is not a profitable stunt to play any selection requested just to please a few persons. You must please the majority and if, like Mr. Sievers, you have a reputation for appropriate music for the picture, stick to your policy. Do not disgust the ones coming to your house with your sound effects by playing celestial voices on the pipe organ during a fight between cowboys and Indians just to please a few who do not know any better.

McINTIRE & RICHTER DISSOLVE

By mutual consent of James L. McIntire and Robert Richter, composing the firm of McIntire & Richter, who for the past eighteen months have been carrying on a motion picture exchange at 23 East Fourteenth street, New York City, the partnership has been dissolved. The dissolution took effect on the 29th of October, 1913, and it has since developed that Mr. Richter has purchased all of the assets of the partnership. Mr. Richter will continue the business alone, at the same address.

"Our Mutual Girl" Series Coming

Unique and Costly Pictures Will Show Transition from Country Lass to Society Leader and Give Intimate Glimpses of New York Life

A PRETENTIOUS series of motion pictures will be put out by the Mutual Film Corporation, featuring "Our Mutual Girl," who, by the way, is Norma Phillips off the screen. This will be an elaborate and costly series of films, showing the transition of "Our Mutual Girl" from a young country girl into a New York society belle.

In the course of the metamorphosis, the girl will be shown in the theatres and cafés of New York, in the smart shops and in all the centers of interest. It is promised that the real leaders of New York life, public men, sociey women and operatic stars will appear in the pictures and also prominent visitors from abroad.

The series is expected to be interesting, especially to motion picture patrons outside of New York, as it will bring them into intimate contact with the busy life of the metropolis. Properly to exploit this undertaking much advertising will be done.

This series, as extensive, perhaps, as any ever shown on the screen, is the personal idea of Harry E. Aitken, president of the Mutual Film Corporation.

NON-FLAM RULES IN PARIS

From Paris comes an article dealing with the new regulation of the Préfect of Police to the effect that, from a date as yet not decided on, none but non-inflammable films are to be shown in picture theatres in Paris. Naturally enough, manufacturers were keenly alive to the necessity of at once endeavoring to secure a modification of this stringent and, apparently, autocratic regulation; but the only concession made by the Préfect is the postponement of the date on which the use of non-flam films is to be made compulsory.

There is considerable reason for the new regulation. Parisian picture theatres cannot be compared with American houses as regards the most important consideration—that of safety in the opinion of many persons qualified to judge. Indeed, the theatres have often been termed "veritable death-traps," and, though the more modern halls are constructed and equipped on proper principles the majority of Parisian halls are said to be lacking in proper and sufficient safeguards against a sudden outbreak of fire.

CRYSTAL READY FOR WORK

The Crystal Film Company is now prepared to keep pace with all printing orders. For some time it has been behindhand with its work, but now, thanks to an enlargement of capacity, it is enabled to meet all demands.

Motion Picture Theatre Construction Department

ILLUSTRATION number one shows the new theatre of Mr. J. Bowles, the Morse, at Rogers Park, Chicago.

The exterior shows a substantial construction free from cheap gingerbread decorations. It is the theatre of the future.

As may be seen, the traditional ticket box of motion picture shows is not there. The ticket office is a cozy small room located on the side of the long lobby and finished in white marble.

I have always been opposed to ticket boxes on the sidewalk and I feel confident that the reader will agree with me.

Exposes Patrons to Weather

It is not very courteous to ask a woman to stand on the sidewalk, especially when it is cold and nasty weather, and have her to remove her gloves, to fish for the desired coin, or to have a lady stand in front of such boxes on rainy days in a pool of water, an unmbrella in one hand. It is not very polite to tell a woman and children that they cannot enter the doors of the lobby before they have purchased their tickets, or to force them to stand in line, in front of the little round ticket box, exposed to winds, rain or snow.

There is still another reason. A woman does not like to open her purse in front of an idle crowd looking at the posters.

The round ticket box on the sidewalk has been a fad like so many features in the motion picture show business. The exhibitors came to the conclusion that the round ticket box was as essential to a motion picture theatre as the mortar in front of a drug store or the striped pole in front of a barber shop. In other words, the round ticket box has been the emblem of motion picture theatres.

I am delighted to see that the progressive exhibitors are discarding these old traditions and recognize the necessity of offering their patrons more courteous treatment.

The next good feature to be found at the Morse theatre is in the side lights. They are not electric light bulbs hanging on the side of the wall, to shine in the eye of the patrons.

Indirect Lighting Used

The side lights of the Morse theatre are electric bulbs inserted deep into a plastic ornament of which the upper part projects about one foot from the wall. These side lights are based on the principle of the indirect lighting system. The electric bulb is invisible but the light strikes the back and upper projection of the plastic ornament and fall back on the seats in diffused rays.

With these side lights the house is well lighted without injuring the picture and without being a sore on the eye of the patrons.

The Regent theatre, in Sheridan Road, also managed by Mr. Bowles, has the same arrangement of side lights. In fact, the Regent is a copy of the Morse or the Morse is a copy on the Regent. Both houses are very similar in the main features and to talk of one is to talk of the other. Both are of the most recent type of construction, fire-proof, with all the exits required by law. While they are very simple in interior decorations, they produce an effect of solid comfort. They look refined. They please the eye. They convey such a good impression as to make one believe that the pictures are better than elsewhere.

Illustration number two shows the Butterfly of Milwaukee, Wis., a night view.

Milwaukee has the reputation of having some of the finest houses in the country, at least has the largest number of fine motion picture theatres in proportion to the population. The Saxe Brothers are the kings of the show business of Milwaukee.

The Butterfly is not one of the houses of the Saxe Brothers but is owned by some members of the Mutual Film Corporation and uses the Mutual service.

The big butterfly is an exact copy of the one at the Royal theatre of Cincinnati, Ohio, but the arch, sides and cornices of the Milwaukee house are of a far superior design. They are not as heavy in construction and are free from ginger bread decorations. The butterfly of the Milwaukee house presents a better effect on account of its tasteful surroundings, while the one of Cincinnati is more or less eclipsed by the too massive columns and cornices of the building and the abuse of plastic ornaments.

THE BUTTERFLY THEATRE

The large windows over the doors are made of stained glass, producing a very pleasant effect, especially when viewed from the opposite side of the street.

The Butterfly theatre has 1,100 seats, a large pipe organ and the indirect lighting system. The comfortable auditorium is tastefully decorated. The projection is excellent and the house well managed, it is in fact a model of cleanliness.

The Vaudette and the American

The old Vaudette theatre has been remodeled with an entire new facade, made of a very high square arch of moorish design.

Mr. J. B. Olinger is still master in his American theatre and like others, he has made progress. While the lobby is small, a clever disposition of mirrors over the doors, reflects the light of the lobby ceiling and give the impression that the lobby is twice its real size.

The next issue of The Motion Picture News will be the Theatre Construction Number in which several theatres of New York, Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Columbus, Cincinnati, St. Louis, Chicago, Milwaukee, Detroit, Cleveland and other cities will be described by the architects themselves.

New York Exhibitors Discuss Legislation

Folks Ordinance, Standee Question and Amendment Lowering License Fees Are Principal Subjects before Meeting

VENTILATION of motion picture theatres, a proposed amendment to the Folks ordinance, so-called, governing motion picture theatres, which would reduce the license for a three hundred seat house from $100 to $25 and make the license for large theatres $50, and the standee question were the chief subjects discussed at the meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York, held last Wednesday at the Hotel Imperial, with Samuel H. Trigger, the president, presiding. The meeting was an open one.

Dr. Loughran, director of the Laboratory of Industrial Hygiene and Sanitation, said that these laboratories had devised a plan whereby the sanitary condition of motion picture houses could be examined and a certificate issued. A committee of five, consisting of Mr. Brandt, chairman P. Rosenson, William Hollander, L. Germain and M. L. Fleishman, was appointed to take up the matter further with Dr. Loughran and report back.

Mrs. Harry Kraft, treasurer of the Widowed Mothers' Fund, thanked the exhibitors for their work in aiding the fund.

Ordinances Are Discussed

Mr. Hunt then spoke on the Folks ordinance and declared that it is impossible to comply with some of its conditions. Alderman John A. Bolles, following Mr. Hunt, said that he had introduced an amendment to the Folks ordinance in the Board of Aldermen. This amendment would reduce the license fees of motion picture theatres very materially.

Rudolph Sanders, chairman of the law and legislation committee, next spoke on the action taken on the standee law and stated that Mr. Nichols, chairman of the law and legislation committee of the Board of Aldermen, had refused to report this ordinance out of the committee and had informed him that he had better take the matter up with the other aldermen. He stated that to this effect he had drafted a letter, explaining the position of the exhibitors in this respect and the favorable points with regard to the standee ordinance. He requested that this letter be signed by individual exhibitors and that the same be sent to their respective aldermen.

Here follows the text of the letter:

"The ordinances of the City of New York as they exist to-day permit people to stand under certain conditions in places of public amusement in which machinery and scenery are used, but do not permit people to stand in motion picture theatres.

"The motion picture business is less, certainly not more, hazardous than the theatrical and vaudeville business and the businesses conducted in many other places of public amusement in this city. The patrons of motion picture theatres are certainly protected as well if not better than the patrons of other places of amusement.

"In theatres and vaudeville houses the seats are reserved, and, as a rule, but one performance is given during the afternoon and one during the evening, whereas in motion picture theatres three or four performances are given during the day and the evening. Because the seats are unreserved and because the people insist upon coming and going at their will and sitting where they please it is invariably true that during each performance in a motion picture theatre there are a number of seats in the front and throughout the auditorium vacant because people will not sit so close to the screen, and the glare of light upon the screen, or because people who come with each other are unable to sit together, but prefer to stand and await the end of the picture, at which time a number of persons always leave the theatre. The number of persons in the theatre, including those standing, do not in many cases exceed the total seating capacity of the theatre.

"Do you think such discrimination is fair and just?

Letter Asks Help

"Are not the motion picture exhibitors entitled to the same rights, privileges and conditions as are granted to others in the entertaining business?

"There is now pending before the committee on law and legislation of the Board of Aldermen an ordinance which grants to the motion picture exhibitor the same privileges which are enjoyed by theatrical, vaudeville and other public entertainers, but the committee refuses to report and it is impossible to have the ordinance acted upon.

"Will you assist us to eliminate this unfair discrimination? Will you do your part in compelling the committee to report on the ordinance or have it discharged from further consideration thereof so that the ordinance may be brought before the board and considered upon its merits?"

THREE RITUAL MURDER FILMS COMING

The trial and acquittal in Russia of Mendel Beiliss for ritual murder is having its echo in the motion picture business. At least three pictures are now being produced based upon the famous case.

The Italian American Film Corporation is producing a three-reel picture entitled "The Horrors of Russia." George K. Rolands has completed another three-part feature entitled "The Terrors of Russia." Mr. Rolands was born in Odessa and is well versed in the life and persecutions of the Russian Jew. Most of the scenes in his drama were enacted at Carmel, N. J., a Jewish colony of more than 500 Jews and Russian peasants.

Ruby Features is putting out a three-reel production entitled "The Black 107" or "The Fate of Mendel Beiliss." Sidney M. Goldin, who produced "Bleeding Hearts" and "Sorrows of Israel" for the Universal Film Manufacturing Company, is producing the picture. For this picture he has secured an entire cast of Russian players. "The Black 107" is the name of a powerful anti-Semitic Russian society. Jan Smoelsky, formerly a Revolutionist spy, is one of the actors in this production. Other releases of Ruby Features are "On the Trail of the Dock Rats," "A Serpent of the Slums," "The Thorns of the Gay White Way" and "The King of the Counterfeiters."

"NOVELLI MODEST," SAYS KLEINE

"Of all the modest men I have ever met," writes George Kleine from the Cines studio at Rome to his Chicago offices, "the Venitius of 'Quo Vadis?' takes first prize. I met Novelli the other day in the big Cines lunchroom and congratulated him on his magnificent work in our big productions.

"Novelli insisted that all credit belonged to Director Guazzoni and the various other members of the cast in 'Quo Vadis?' He is a quiet, retiring fellow, not at all given to the vanity and flourish so characteristic of our American actors.

"Certainly Novelli earned the title of 'great actor' in 'Quo Vadis?' and certainly he is about the last man to tell you so. He is decidedly shy, with a soldierly bearing, and the gentlemanly calm which the men of Italy whom I have met here carry with them."

Mixed Nuts. Biograph. (Nov. 13.) —A short comedy that will amuse greatly. The "nuts" escape. One, a man, imagines himself to be Hamlet-Romeo and makes violent protestations to a girl, not a "nut." The other, a woman, is a semi-Ophelia and she loves the girl's husband. This creates family differences until the keepers arrive.

The Sea Eternal. Lubin. (Nov. 13.) Two reels.—There are two things in this film that might be remedied and so strengthen the picture. The newly born baby is too old and Arthur Johnson, as a grandfather, is too young. The story itself is one of interest and above the average. John, a fisherman, lives with his wife, both being happy until the arrival of Mason, a merchant, who makes love to Mary. He gets her to go to sea with him in a boat, ostensibly to rescue her husband, but really keeps her out all night so that Jim will drive her away. John gets very angry at this and will not help them when a storm comes up. Their little child is left in the charge of neighbors and John leaves, thinking Mary dead. Years pass by and Ned, the foster brother of John's little girl, loves her. Crazy Mary takes a great fancy to the bride, not knowing her to be her own child. She goes to sea in a leaky rowboat to bring Ned back to the girl, and the boat sinks. She is saved by John, who has come to the town by chance and the family are reunited.

The Right Man. Vitagraph. (Nov. 13.)—George Cooper as the brother in this drama, is very good. Earle Williams and Lillian Walker also do well. Ned, Rose's brother, has plunged heavily in the stock market and has apparently lost all. He advises his sister to marry Strong, whom she does not love, because of his money. She agrees. Without betraying himself, Strong "bulls" the market and Ned recovers his money with interest. He then breaks the engagement with Strong for his sister. Rose, in the meantime, has decided that she cannot live without Strong, and tells him all the truth, adding that she now loves him.

A Slave of Satan. Patheplay. Two reels. (Nov. 13.)—A foreign production. Just why it is called "The Slave of Satan" is not entirely made clear. The leading lady is not beautiful (as advertised) and she is so excruciatingly thin as to spoil the effect. She is a banker's daughter, who tiring of her life, becomes an artists' model. She is very fickle. The artist loves her, but knowing her to be untrue, consents to meet a banker's daughter with the intention of marrying her. The banker's daughter and the model turn out to be the same, she, however, denying the fact. Later he proves this and she is cast in the streets by her father. The artist meets her again later, when she is in the depths of despondency and marries her, she having by this time "reformed."

Mrs. Casey's Gorilla. Biograph. (Nov. 13.)—On the same reel with "Mixed Nuts" and of about the same quality and quantity. The names and makeup of the various characters are sufficient to arouse humor without action. Count Castoria is tendered parties by both Mrs. Casey and Mrs. Murphy. When the latter has given a "monkey party" Mrs. Casey decides to out-do her and gives a "Gorilla party" with her husband in the stellar role. All goes well until the "Gorilla" sees the Count making love to Mrs. Casey, and then the cage is not strong enough to withhold his violent passion.

The New School Marm of Green River. Essanay. (Nov. 13.)—A "Western" with nothing particularly original to recommend it. A school teacher is saved from insult from a gambler by the decisive action of the pony post rider. The Government employee and the teacher having decided they love one another, arrange a code of signals with pistol shots. The postman is held up one day after having fired the arranged signal and the girl saves him from robbery and arrests the gambler and his aide.

The Boomerang. Essanay. Two parts. (Nov. 14.)—There is plenty of action in this story. The government has some very important plans stolen. One of four men can only be the thief. Irene, the daughter of the secretary of war, loves Maxwell, who unknown to her is a spy and the one who has stolen the plans. The conspirators discover the plans they have stolen to be worthless without the "key." A second attempt is made, but Irene knowing this, places the "key" safely away and substitutes blank paper. She then follows the thief and traces him to their den where she is captured. She then recognizes her former fiancé. The police arrive shortly after and the girl returns home with her father.

When Brothers Go to War. Lubin. (Nov. 14.) General Film Co. Exclusive Service.—A good drama, strongly told, dealing with the recent and present unrest in Mexico. Two brothers divide the property of their mother's estate, the elder getting only an amber cross, and the younger all the money and property. The younger also wins his brother's fiancee. Later when war is declared the lucky brother joins the state troops while Jose joins the insurrectionists. Capt. Valdez is captured by the peasant soldiers under Jose, but he immediately sets him free, for which action he is condemned and shot. His last act is to send the cross to Captain Valdez.

The General's Children. Patheplay. (Nov. 14.) General Film Co. Exclusive Service.—With Asta Neilsen, the German actress, playing the lead. Apparently she has not a good vehicle, for she does not excel. Karl, the general's son, having passed a worthless check, must get out of the country. His sister, Thekla, gives him the money, which he gambles away. Not having enough to leave the country, he hides. The girl becomes engaged to a rich young man, who is warned about her midnight pilgrimages. He follows her and finds her in the arms of another man. He tells her parents and they follow her and find the son. The truth is then told and the boy Karl forgiven.

Fanny's Constancy. Vitagraph (Nov. 14.)—Ethel Lloyd as the maid in this picture is extremely good. Without her the picture would lose much of its value. Hubby returns home too fat. "Nobody loves a fat man" says wifey and commences to make him train down. Everything fails. She writes to Jack, her cousin, and asks his help. He half destroys the letter to light his pipe; the other half, which hubby finds, looks as though they were going to poison him. The police ferret out the truth and the laugh is on hubby. Although half of the letter is shown, being burned to light a pipe with, when it is again thrown on the screen as an insert, it is whole.

When the Clock Stopped. Lubin. (Nov. 14.)—The writer is to be congratulated on the name of this drama. It is most appropriate and has a good sound. George Bennett, a real estate broker, has invested all his money in some property which he has almost sold to a manufacturer at a large profit. Enter the villian. Percy, the manufacturer's secretary, has been rude to the stenographer, and one day George rebukes him for it on the street. Therefore, in revenge he prevents the sale from going through by stating that the property is no good. Later the manufacturer goes to investigate himself, at the wish of the stenographer, and is pleased with the land. He calls at George's house just as a note is delivered to his wife, stating that George intends to kill himself at five o'clock. They rush to the office, arriving there at 5:15. The clock in the office has stopped and George still waiting for five to strike, is safe.

The Slate Industry. Patheplay. (Nov. 14.)—An instructive treatise on the making and shipping of slate. Pictures on this subject have, however, been shown before. The drilling and blasting are shown, followed by the sawing and shaping and the final shipping.

Butterfly Preservation. Patheplay. (Nov. 14.)—On the same reel with "The Slate Industry." Shows the methods of catching and preparing moths and butterflies for museum purposes. It does very well as a "filler," but will probably fail to "get across" with an average audience. The photography is good.

Hypnotizing Mamie. Kalem. (Nov. 14.)—On the same reel with "The Fickle Freak." Svengali, a hypnotist, on whom the original Svengali has nought, needed a "subject" and gets Mamie. She does very well on the stage until her mother and fiance come in. The water in the fire pails help bring her to. The action is quick and clever and should bring the house down.

The Fickle Freak. Kalem. (Nov. 14.)—A tale of the circus which will amuse greatly. The human pincushion is loved by the bearded lady, but he loves the Circassian girl. So the bearded lady shaves and loses her job. A letter telling her that her uncle has left her some property brings the pincushion to her arms, but a picture of the property drives him back to her rival. John E. Brennan's impersonation of a Circassian girl was great. Ruth Roland played the bearded lady.

Mystery of the Crimson Trail. Patheplay. (Nov. 17.) General Film Company Exclusive Service.—A roaring good comedy with more than a touch of burlesque. "Happy," a tramp, having been ousted, plans revenge. A red paint pot and brush are his only weapons, but they are more than sufficient. He also helps a couple get married by posing as a witness.

A Female Fagin. Kalem. (Nov. 17.) General Film Co. Exclusive Service.—A good drama with plenty of good action. Helen Gilmore plays the lead. Two sisters in a department store steal from customers. One works as a sales girl, the other in the cashier's booth. The former steals things and ships them through the pneumatic tubes to her sister who conceals it. The proceeds are given to the woman who keeps them. They are caught through the detective work of Grace, the daughter of the proprietor, and her lover, the manager. The police are called in and the woman arrested.

Sir Highwayman. Warner's Features, Inc. Three parts.—A melodramatic masterpiece. With the great numbers of "Westerns" on the market, it is indeed a relief to see one that depicts "God's country" as it really was when the rustler and .44 were rife. Rex Marlow becomes an outlaw after he has seen his father robbed and killed by the "crime gang" and his property, which should have gone to his adopted sister, stolen. He robs only those who have done him so much wrong. Later he meets "Scotty" the girl, when he rescues her in an accident, and when they have recognized one another he tells her his story, confessing that it has been for her sake that he had done the robbing. Finally he is able to restore to the girl the money which is hers by right, and reaps his reward in her thanks. The cast is good and the action rapid and clever. An Aztec treasure cave also plays an interesting part.

The Woman. Broncho. Two reels.—It does not seem that the name "The Woman" is a very appropriate one, in this case being too general. John, a consumptive, is dying. His wife, an actress, is supporting him by singing, when she is told that he will have a fighting chance if moved to Arizona. They manage to get there and she takes his place in the land rush, but is injured so badly that she cannot get any allotment. A wonderful stage fall is pictured. She then gets a position in a dance hall, where she is insulted until protected by one of the miners. He asks her to marry him, and in order to get some money, she consents and commits bigamy. John, however, dies and the secret is kept.

During the Carnival in San Francisco. Keystone.—The parades and jubilee that celebrated the anniversary of Balboa's discovery of the Pacific. There were soldiers and sailors galore. The West Pointers and Zouaves made the best showing. A good picture, though very short.

A Woman of the West. Bison. Two reels.—Directed by David M. Hartford. The story is rather conventional and possesses little to really recommend it. One brother steals money from his father and kills him in the fight when he is caught. Andy, a Mexican, demands blood money, as he saw the deed. Together they throw the blame on Frank, the other brother, who is at the time in Butte working. He surrenders on hearing the charge Through the girl and a detective he proves his innocence and the two conspirators are arrested. The duel with the girl in the last reel is very good.

"Red Margaret"—Moonshiner. Bison. Two reels.—Just why she is called "Red" is not apparent. Pauline Bush interprets the part well, but

SPECIAL FILM REVIEWS

WHEN the Earth Trembled, or The Strength of Love. Lubin. Three reels. (Nov. 12.) General Film Company Exclusive Service.—The mechanical effects in this long picture are wonderfully realistic. The San Francisco earthquake calamity is utilized as the scene of the plot, the actual earthquake and fire are most costly and truthful representations of the original.

Paul Girard, while in Paris, falls in love and marries Dora Sims, the daughter of his father's former business partner. His father, a shipbuilder, has broken off with Sims and offers his place to Paul, disowning him, however, on hearing of his marriage to Sims' daughter. Paul and Sims go West and start a business of their own, which prospers. The father, hearing of this, buys up all the stock of this company in order to ruin his son. This part seems a little unnatural. Paul is sent to Samoa to look after the interests of the now nearly bankrupt company. The ship is wrecked and all are believed lost. The father extends time to the company on hearing of his son's death. Then the earthquake, in which buildings fall, the earth seems to actually tremble and the crowds flee. Sims is killed by a falling building. Dora and her two children go to Philadelphia, where the children are adopted by Girard, Sr., who refuses to take Dora. She obtains a position as governess to her own children. Paul, after numerous adventures, arrives home and is welcomed by the now penitent father.

A clever plot, well directed and good photography. Films like this will always be very acceptable. A. D. M.

The Judgment of Buddha. Melies Two parts. (Nov. 13.)—This picture possesses a little originality. A sultan, having become the object of hatred of his prime minister, is open to his attacks. When the Sultan has punished him for a flagrant offense, the minister steals his favorite daughter and has her brought up by a villager, later bringing her back to the Sultan as a dancing girl. The potentate, realizing her great beauty, marries her, thus committing one of the worst sins in the Buddhist faith. Later the truth becomes known, and the minister is executed. The Sultan and his daughter-wife are thrown into "durance vile." The girl escapes and implores the aid of the high priest, who gives him a chance. He is to build a temple in ten days, but failing in this they are turned into stone images by the god.

From Out of the Flood. Lubin Two parts. (Nov. 17.) General Film Company Exclusive Service.—This is a very strong dramatic story. The scenes are laid in Dayton, Ohio, during the recent floods, actual scenes from which are shown. Andrew Tyler, one of the "idle rich," marries a chorus girl on a dare the night the dam breaks. They are separated during the flood, and Andrew shows his true colors in his rescue of a girl from the hands of what the sub-title calls a "ghoul." This is incorrect as a ghoul is one who robs dead bodies only. Florette, Andrew's wife, dies, her last request being to the girl who has taken care of her in the hospital. She asks her to go to Andrew's house and pose as his wife in her place. Nan goes and Mr. Tyler, Sr., takes a great fancy to her. Andrew, believed dead, has lost his memory, which, however, returns after an operation. He is welcomed home, and Nan tells him the truth. At the request of his father, she stays. Later Andrew knows he loves her and they are married secretly.

Across the Continent. Pilot Feature. Four parts.—There is not a form of crime from murder to forgery that is missed in this picture. The action is plentiful. The reels are overcrowded with action and it is difficult to keep track of the various characters. There are some very thrilling escapes.

The evil of drink is used as the basis for the story and in this the film teaches a good moral lesson. Adderly, a saloon keeper, teaches George to drink, thus ruining his home and killing his wife. The terrible curse of Agnes, the wife, against the saloon keeper comes true. His son steals his wealth and turns him out to starve, even after he had become blind. The son then affixes the blame for a theft on the shoulders of Joe Ferris, an innocent stranger, and sends him to prison for three years. He escapes and proceeds to vindicate himself. A pal of the saloon keeper's son, dying, confesses to the conspiracy to land Joe in jail, and a warrant is made out against John, the villain. He is arrested but escapes, and, disguised as a girl, abducts the heroine. She is rescued by the "comedian," a negro, and marries Joe, whose name is now cleared. John returns to prison blinded.

The Harper Mystery. Florence Turner Films Co., Ltd. Three Reels.—One of the greatest detective stories that has ever been produced. The character work of Miss Turner is exceptionally fine, and she is supported by a good company. The photography is excellent, and great care has apparently been given over to the small details.

A girl finds a ring in Grubb's Alley with a handkerchief with the word "help" on it. She is arrested and asks Miss Kent to defend her. Going to the place where the ring was found, disguised as an Italian woman, she sends a monkey up the pipe to an open window. The monkey returns with a note to the effect that a woman has been drugged and is held a prisoner there. In another disguise her companion, Joe Miller, another detective, follows a man on his leaving the house, but is caught by the conspirators and held. They then send a note to the nurse in the house where the woman is held prisoner telling her that they have been followed and to be careful.

Miss Kent intercepts the note, overpowers the nurse, and, in the disguise of the old prisoner, is carried to the other house, where her mate is a prisoner. By clever work she arrests the three men, frees Joe, and together they take them to prison. It then appears that the woman is being held for her money by relations. Most exciting throughout. Does not drag. Joe Miller is played by Coley Goodman; Steve Bright, the villain, by Frank Tennant. The story was written and produced by Larry Trimble.

The Port of Doom. Famous Players. Three Reels.—The plot is good and the acting agreeable, but the picture is not up to the standard expected from this company. It is a detective story, dealing with the disappearance of a girl and her final recovery through the work of Kate Kirby and her father. A wealthy ship-owner wishes to match his daughter with his secretary. The girl disappears and the Kirbys are notified.

An examination into the life of the secretary leads to the fact that he is leading a dual life and is already married. The girl has shipped to sea in the meantime as the wife of the man she loves, i. e., the mate. News is received that the ship will sink, as she has been doomed. Kate catches her at a Southern port and boards her. They, however, refuse to give up the journey, and so Kate goes along. The ship sinks and they are saved by the merest chance. The water scenes were well directed.

The cast was as follows: Peter Lang, Hattie Forsythe, David Wall, House Peters, Hal Clarendon, Harris

Gordon and Laura Sawyer. The work of David Wall was most commendable.

False News. Gaumont. Two Reels. (Dec. 6.)—Mme. Bertha Dagmar, one of the highest paid women on the French screen, plays the lead in the picture. The French idea of American cowboys is good, considering that the picture was produced in France, with a foreign cast.

Two reporters, Miss Walker and Jack Morgan, receive news of the death of a famous banker. They go to investigate and the story is told them in confidence. Jack wishes to break the confidence for his own personal gain, and to do this he must secure Miss Walker's silence. The girl refuses to work the dastardly scheme with him, so she is bound and gagged by a gang in the pay of Jack. She escapes and hears that the financier is not dead, but in a faint. So she gets the "exclusive" after all. Morgan is killed in a fight.

What the Gods Decree. World Special. Four Parts.—Josette Andriot, who has received so much mention by her wonderful work in Protea, plays the stellar role in this production with just as much enthusiasm as before. Her work is worthy of praise.

Darsac, a wealthy African trader, goes to India and steals a valuable necklace from the neck of one of the gods at the demand of his wife. After a series of adventures he arrives back at his home in Europe and presents his wife with the jewels. Kali, a dancing-girl, folloms him on his yacht, managing at last to recover the necklace and escape. She is recaptured, and Darsac recovers his stolen property. He immediately has his grounds guarded by lions and his house with numerous trap-doors. The girl on entering the grounds manages to elude the lions, strangles the guard in the treasure-room, but falls through a trap-door into a cage. It is only through a superhuman effort that she escapes.

She then pursues another course. Stealing the man's child, she puts her into a hypnotic sleep. One thing after another happens until the trader is only too glad to return the stolen necklace, and Kali, in the goodness of her heart, forgives him.

The action is well-timed and does not lag in any place. Many novel plans are worked with telling effect.

MIDGAR FEATURES GET MULLER RELEASES

He is a man of vast experiences personally and his staff, from producer to stage carpenter, is one of the best in Europe. We have looked over some of the advance scenarios and the first one to be released, "The Mystery of Richmond Castle," is a picture of unusual rapid action throughout its entire length."

GENERAL FEATURE FILM BUYS

Contracts have been consummated by Joseph R. Miles for the output of Ramo and Film releases of America for Northern Illinois. The General Feature Film Company, of Chicago, which bought out the M. & F. Feature Film Company, fell heir to these contracts.

"CHECKERS" REACHES THE SCREEN

Exciting Racing Scenes and Natural Acting of Thomas W. Ross Features of Film Version of Famous Play and Novel

"CHECKERS," the famous racing play of Henry M. Blossom, Jr., a production which for many years was one of the hits of the legitimate stage, has now reached the screen through the six-part production of the All-Star Feature Corporation. Thomas W. Ross, who is the "Checkers" of the original production, is seen in the title part on the screen. His technique as a motion picture actor is excellent, and his quiet, natural acting is very pleasant. The scenario upon which the production is based was prepared by Lawrence McGill and Eustace Hale Ball.

In selecting the play and novel of "Checkers" as its second release, the All-Star Corporation has shown great acumen. Racing subjects on the screen, or in plays, or in books, are always popular, because the majority of people love horses. Especially thoroughbreds, and the element of chance appeals to the gambling instinct of humanity.

The All-Star Feature Corporation, in this production, holds to its policy of making noteworthy films. This picture has many important scenes, all of which were produced with proper dignity. The racing scenes, for instance, were taken at different race-tracks. When the run comes on the bank, a specially constructed bank is destroyed by the angry creditors. The cast has been selected with a view to getting the best players. Thomas W. Ross again plays "Checkers" and opposite to him is Katherine La Salle, as "Pert Barlow." Jack Reagan, as "Push Miller," gives an impression of his part that places him in a class with Tommy Ross.

The story of "Checkers," told briefly, is as follows:

The Story of the Picture

Edward Campbell, known as "Checkers," works his way up from messenger boy to a clerkship in a bank. Upon the death of his mother he gets into bad company, loses his position, and is without friends who can help him. Coaxed into a gambling house, he loses his last dollar, and then is given a job as dealer. One evening there is a fight, during which a man is killed. Checkers is suspected, but innocent. Fearful, he determines to get away from the city. Meeting a race-horse tout, Push Miller, they make their way South to the track. Winning some money, they follow the horses to Hot Springs, Ark.

Arthur Kendall, a young man from Clarksville, Ark., gets very friendly with Checkers. Kendall goes off on a spree, and his sweetheart, Pert Barlow, and her father come to bring him home. Arthur will go only if Checkers accompanies him. Wishing to earn an honest living, Checkers takes the opportunity, and goes to work in the general store of Arthur's father.

Pert Barlow breaks her engagement with Arthur, and Checkers falls in love with her. Pert Barlow's father, wishing her to marry Arthur Kendall, forbids Checkers to see her and tells him not to come back to Clarksville until he has made $5,000 by honest work. Pert gives Checkers an old California $50 gold piece as a love token.

Leaving Clarksville, Checkers is unable to secure any employment. He tries again and again. One day, broke, he drifts down to the track, hoping to meet some of his old friends from whom he can borrow money. Pert Barlow, her father, Arthur Kendall, and others from Clarksville are at the track that same day.

In desperation at seeing Pert and Arthur together, Checkers bets the $50 gold piece Pert has given him on a horse called Remorse, at odds of 100 to 1. Remorse wins. Seeing Checkers, the father of Pert tears her away. Checkers follows them to Clarksville.

As his $5,000 has not been earned by honest work, Checkers knows he cannot claim Pert. But while he is in Clarksville a run is started on the bank owned by Pert's father. Checkers uses his ready wit in holding the crowd of clamoring depositors, and finally saves the day by the deposit of the $5,000 which he has won.

"CHECKERS" WOOES PERT

At this, Pert's father declares that he needs Checkers as a son-in-law, Pert approves the choice, and all are therefore happy.

Others in the cast are Gertrude Shipman, as "Cynthy"; Alfred Sidwell, as "Jerry Halter"; Marie Taylor, as "Aunt Deb"; Carl Hartberg, as "Judge Martin"; William A. Williams, as "Arthur Kendall"; Harriet Worthington, as "Sadie," and Charles Graham as "Barlow."

"CHECKERS" DEFENDS PERT'S FATHER FROM THE ANGRY DEPOSITORS

Not a Dull Moment

The film goes through its entire six reels without a dull moment. When shown at the Broadway Theatre, New York City, to an invited audience, the racing scenes drew much applause. This they will always do, for they are very exciting. Many small touches, such as a puppy dog rolling around in the stall in the stable scenes, were well received.

"Checkers" is a production founded on a famous novel and a famous play. It is put out by the All-Star Feature Corporation, and up to that company's high standard. On the screen it seems sure to occupy the same position that it did in the realm of literature and on the legitimate stage.

"LIFE OF WAGNER" IN MOTION PICTURES

Klaw and Erlanger Select Subject of Great Historic and Educational Value for First of Exhibitions in Theatres Hitherto Solely "Legitimate"

LAST Friday, at the New Amsterdam Theatre, New York City, where "The Little Cafe" is playing, Klaw and Erlanger introduced a new series of special performances by showing in motion pictures the career of Richard Wagner. Similar performances will be given regularly hereafter on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday afternoons, and on Sunday afternoons and evenings—afternoons and evenings, in other words, when the house is not given over to its regular stage performances.

Considerable interest is attached to the experiment. It is Klaw and Erlanger's first move—in the exhibition of motion pictures. Another prominent theatrical firm, the Shuberts, have already followed suit. Last Sunday evening at the New York Hippodrome they gave over the big theatre to pictures of the Mexican revolution, instead of to the usual Sunday concerts.

Leave Vivid Impression

Artistically the Richard Wagner pictures are of a high order. They were accompanied throughout with appropriate selections from the Wagner operas, ably rendered by W. H. Humeston, organist. R. S. Pigott, narrator, explained the pictures.

It would seem as though the venture ought to prove successful. It will in all probability, if it is properly advertised. The people in New York to whom these pictures will appeal, and there are many such, are by no means well aware of the artistic motion picture. They must be told, and directed. The human interest of Wagner's life, over and above his achievements as a composer, gives the production a wide public appeal.

To the writer the pictures were particularly interesting in that they showed how much can be done—how much undoubtedly will be done—by the educational film.

Here, in a few hours, is given a vivid, comprehensive, literal, lasting impression of the whole life of an historical character. The same result could be had by no other educational method.

The Messten Film, Berlin, deserves much credit for this excellent production. The settings are admirable and authentic. The likenesses of Liszt, von Bulow, Ludwig, of Bavaria, are perfect, while the unnamed actor who took the part of the master achieved wonders in his change of expression from youth to middle age. Frau Cosima Wagner is said to have lent her sympathetic support in making the scenes and incidents authentic and accurate.

Steps in Wagner's Career

The production is divided into four parts, the first from Wagner's childhood until he is conductor at Konigsberg in 1836. It shows the composer as a young man at school and his marriage to Wilhelmina Planer—Minna. The second part finds Wagner a conductor at Riga. He is compelled to flee from his debtors and gets to Paris, where he meets Meyerbeer and Liszt. He is in dire straits, but a letter comes from his brother with news that his opera, "Rienzi," is to be produced in Dresden and he must come there.

In the third part the success of "Rienzi" is shown, with Wagner's appointment as director of the Dresden opera in 1842. He was then thirty years old. "The Flying Dutchman" and "Tannhauser" fail and he is dismissed.

Desperate from lack of funds and debt, Wagner joins the uprising of 1849. Again he is forced to flee, but this time Liszt gives him money and helps him to settle in Zurich. He reads the libretto of the "Nibelung Ring" to his friends. Here the film punctuates the reading of the manuscript with scenes from the "Ring." Inspired by the beautiful Frau Wesendock, Wagner begins "Tristan and Isolde." He quarrels with Minna and they separate.

The final part shows Wagner at the summit of his success. Under the patronage of King Ludwig, of Bavaria, he is established at Munich in 1864. Political scheming by the King's ministers, who are anxious to turn the liking of the King for Wagner to their advantage, makes trouble for him.

Death Follows His Triumph

When the King sends 50,000 francs to the composer, the ministers see that it is sent in the smallest coin of the realm, and on a cart so that the people may think the King is draining his treasury for a favorite. They induce the King to send Wagner to Lucerne.

There Wagner composes the "Meistersinger" and is visited by King Ludwig. Cosima, daughter of Liszt and wife of von Bulow, is separated from her husband. She knew Wagner in the lean years in Zurich. Minna is dead. Cosima and Wagner are married. Wagner's triumph at Bayreuth follows and the film ends with the bier of the composer. He died on February 13, 1883.

KEYSTONE MABEL

The hour is fleet and life is sweet
When Mabel "moves" before me,
And I am "Keystoned" in my seat,
The round world "reeling" o'er me.

When late my queen of gasoline
No charm possessed to hold me,
A vista gray for minds blase
The future did unfold me.

Upon the earth there seemed a dearth
Of new delights to cheer me,
Tho' I'd been told by young and old
That one was "moving" near me.

Some providential agent smashed
All mirth-subduing strictures,
And on my startled vision flashed
A world in moving pictures!

Oh! there's a joy, for man and boy
Tremendously entrancing,
One only feels when Keystone "reels"
Upon the screen are "dancing."

The hour is fleet and life is sweet
When Mabel "moves" before me,
And I am "Keystoned" in my seat,
The round world "reeling" o'er me.

Milwaukee, 1913. PATRICK J. NOLAN.

BLACHE OPENS OFFICES

Of significance to buyers in territories where features have not been accorded the support shown in the other territories is the action of Herbert Blache, president of the Exclusive Supply Corporation in opening offices in New York State, St. Louis and Indianapolis for the rental of Solax, Blache American and other features on the Exclusive program. This move indicates the intention to invigorate sluggish conditions.

there is no cause for the name except that it sounds melodramatic. The revenue men and the moonshiners are constantly at war, the former getting the worst of the fight. Finally they plan wholesale war on the law-breakers. The gang is captured with the exception of Margaret, who is supposedly the leader. She is allowed to go free by the agent, whom she has befriended. He is blinded by a shot, and Margaret, knowing he will be disgraced, leads him into town, places a pistol in his hand, and surrenders herself to him, saving his reputation.

The Were Wolf. Bison. Two reels.—Absolutely the most asinine affair ever produced. It is an insult to place it in the form seen by the reviewer before any audience. Imagine the Grecian belief of the transmigration of souls used this way. The girl turns into a wolf, and after a hundred years meets the descendant of the man, and not only do they know one another, but the wolf regains her form of a girl, and she shoots and kills him. If this were a fairy story it would be laughed at.

The Frame-Up. Broncho. Two reels.—Apropos of the present political unrest throughout the country. A good story in which moral politics win despite the efforts of the boss and his gang. In order to defeat the candidate for Mayor, the boss obtains an affidavit from a woman of the underworld which, if made public, though untrue, would ruin his opponent's every chance. Through many channels the action flows. The finale shows the unearthing of the truth. A wonderful automobile accident is staged and the woman, knowing she is to die, confesses that her affidavit lays her open to perjury, and the young man wins.

Our New Minister. Kalem. Three parts. (Nov. 12.)—A man is sent to the penitentiary for the theft of another. Drink was his only offense, and while in a drunken stupor he steals for a lawyer, who has him arrested. On his return from prison he is avoided by all except a few, among whom the new minister and his daughter occupy prominent places. The deacons of the church try to expel the minister for his friendship and so-called radicalism. One day an escaped prisoner arrives at Lem's house and is given assistance. While he is hiding the sheriff hides also, hoping to catch the escaped man. The lawyer comes in and the sheriff overhears him confessing his crime to Lem and immediately arrests him. The romance between the minister and the ex-convict, Lem's daughter, is very pretty. But the town constable or sheriff, Joseph Conyer, was by far the best of all. The Kalem Company informs us he played that part in the original "legitimate" production.

L'Article 47. Majestic. Two Reels.—After the celebrated play by the same name that has been shown in nearly every stock theatre in the country and abroad. George loves Cora, a profligate woman, and refuses to give her up at the request of his mother. Mazilier, a Frenchman, is attentive to her also, and it is because of this the two quarrel. In the fight Cora is accidentally shot by George, who is sent to the galleys for five years. Mazilier starts a gambling house in Paris, where George on his release finds them. He has, on his leaving the prison, been forced to sign a paper swearing to report to the authorities any change of his address. He does not do this and Cora threatens to tell the police. To keep the matter secret from his young wife, whom he has just married, he sees her secretly. After some time his wife meets him there and the whole truth comes out. He is arrested but a pardon arrives in time to prevent his return to jail.

Commencement at Indian School, Carlyle, Pa. Reliance.—Not as good a picture as one would be led to expect with such a title. The students drilling, a group of parents in costume, and Congressman Carter, an Indian, and Chief Three Bears shaking hands are shown. Surely there is more of interest than that.

For Love of a Man. Reliance. Two reels.—Woman's love has ever been of greater strength than man's, and this picture is a good exponent of this fact. Mary, a servant, loves the chauffeur. She, the trusted servant, allows James to look at her mistress' jewels, which he steals. Mary is blamed and is sent to the penitentiary. After her release she goes from one position to another, always her past found out, until finally she is coaxed to steal from the judge's house. She repents and returns the silver, only to be caught by James, now a chauffeur there. She tells the judge the truth on perceiving James' perfidy and the latter goes to jail.

The Ultimate Solution. Bison. Two Reels.—One of the best stories Captain Peacock has written. India, the land of mysticism, is chosen for the main settings. A tourist steals a little god from one of the temples in India. He is followed back to his home in New Jersey by fakirs, who attempt to obtain the idol back. The man, getting old, hires a secretary, who on entering the room finds the old man stabbed. Bainbridge, the servant, accuses her of the deed, and she has to flee, seeing that the evidence is against her. She later marries Clifford, the nephew of the murdered man. Bainbridge recognizes her and blackmails her until finally she is able to prove her innocence through the aid of a diary of the dead man, and Bainbridge is arrested Plenty of action.

Sorrows of Lincoln. Nestor. Two Reels.—Francis Ford makes up very well as Lincoln. The story of the life of the great war President is one full of interest and dramatic incidents. There are long skips in this film story, which shows but little of his real life.

The Heart of a Police Officer. World Special. Four Reels.—After the Italian drama by Enrico Gemelli of the same name. A very interesting story is drawn out. A. Cappozi plays the lead with much cleverness. The story tells of a hunter, who, being pressed for money to feed his starving children, becomes a poacher. He is arrested by a scheming gamekeeper, who loves his wife, and given thirty days to pay a fine of $60. He Is Your Business Successful?

Scarcely one exhibitor in the country has made money without a great preliminary struggle. The Motion Picture News offers a complete photographic outfit free to the exhibitor writing the best story of his "Experiences as an Exhibitor"

The Offer Includes

A high class motion picture camera, tripod, panoramic tilting head, and four magazines, each holding two hundred feet of film. It can be used by any exhibitor to take motion pictures of local families, local events, and advertising film for merchants in his city. Detailed instructions for operating the camera, and ways and means by which it can be used to earn money for the winner will be included.

Conditions Governing the Contest

The story must not exceed two thousand words. Write on one side of the paper only, and have it typewritten, if possible. Write about your actual experiences; how you started, and why; tell about your greatest problem in making the theatre pay; how you met competition; how you manage your employes, and of the adverse conditions you had to overcome. If you believe in advertising, tell why, and in what way.

If your theatre has been a success, there are a thousand reasons why. If you are still in the long fight, you can write just as interestingly and helpfully as the man who has already won out. Tell the others how you made good, and then read about how they fought their battles.

The Contest Will End March 1, 1914

All stories, complying with the requirements of the contest, will be published. Editors of The Motion Picture News will make the award. Please address your story to is unable to, and when the time is up his debt is paid by one of the policemen. The latter recovers his money when the chief has learned of his sacrifice.

Port of Missing Women. Selig. (Nov. 18.)—The picture itself is very good. Decollete Nell goes into the haven for women who have erred and there tells her story. She tells of her leaving the farm and going to the city as an artist's model, of her finding out that the man she loved was only playing with her, and how she refused to return with her father. As she finishes her tale her father enters and they are reunited. The old man takes all the women back with him to his farm, which he now calls "The Port of Missing Women."

Tangled Threads. Vitagraph. (Nov. 17.)—This sent a large audience at the Herald Square Theatre, New York, into roars of laughter. It is indexed by the Vitagraph Company as a drama. More "dramas" like this are needed. Alice wants to marry Jimmie, but Pa says "nay." Therefore they concoct the scheme of having Harry, a friend of Alice's, ask for her hand, to draw Pa's attention away from Jimmie. This works, but works too well, for Pa accepts Harry, and even issues announcements. But Harry is engaged to another and doesn't like the outlook "for a hang." The father is made to see things in the right light when he is caught proposing to Miss Grace. Harry wofully states that if he will let Jimmie marry his supposed fiancee he will keep quiet.

The Stolen Tapestries. Kalem. (Nov. 17.)—There is only one fault to find with this picture, the love-making scenes are very timid. No one would ever believe that the girl loves him, or vice versa. The story otherwise is a good detective yarn. Some tapestries are stolen and a note demanding $5,000 received. Detectives are put on the trail and the valuable tapestries are returned in shreds. More are stolen and a demand for $50,000 received. This is paid. The young man then goes on the trail of the crooks and locates them. He wins the girl.

Nora's Boarders. Edison. (Nov. 17.)—This picture is supposedly a very small town, one of the kind where the postoffice is in the general store, and there is a town bulletin-board instead of a newspaper. Yet it supports a large boarding-house, apparently has a myriad of bachelors, has street numbers, and boasts a first-class real-estate office. The widow

AMERICAN PLAYERS BAND BENEFIT

Saturday, November 29, has been decided upon as the date for the benefit given by the players of the American Film Manufacturing Company for La Monica's Santa Barbara band at the Potter Theatre, Santa Barbara.

A carefully selected cast from the American players on that evening appear in Sydney Ayres' four-act drama, "Texas," a play in which he starred under the Erlanger management.

Vivian Rich, who plays opposite Mr. Ayres in moving pictures, will have the leading woman's part in "Texas." Harry Von Meter will be cast for a part. The play will also call for the use of horses on the stage. These will be the same as often seen in moving pictures, rushing through Santa Barbara scenery. All arrangements for the theatre were perfected by Julius Frankenberg with Manager H. Callis.

The making of this benefit for the band was the suggestion of President S. S. Hutchinson, who was first consulted. The coming performance will have all of professional finish, as every person to be cast will have had actual stage experience.

While moving picture players have appeared in public, this will be the first time in the history of the film industry that a company has been gathered together for actual stage work. As such it will attract much attention.

"THE SUBTERRANEAN CITY" IS REMARKABLE KLEINE-ECLIPSE

"The Subterranean City" or "Trailing the Jewel Thieves," to be released in America by George Kleine, Tuesday, November 25, in two parts, is one of the rarest and most beautiful Eclipse releases ever seen in America. The cost of props. used in "The Subterranean City" amounts to a considerable sum, and they were not only difficult to build but practically unpurchasable.

The central theme of the story centers about a wealthy and resourceful gang of jewel thieves in Paris, who build a "Subterranean City," wherein their ill-gotten loot is stored, and where many unique machines are seen actually manufacturing jewelry.

One of the odd props. used in this picture is a gigantic hydraulic press with which the chemicals constituting diamonds are compressed into large stones. The thrilling escape of "Arizona Bill" after he had been placed between the great presses and is left to die a horrible death marks a situation both unique and powerful.

Latest News from Chicago

Ventilation Fight Still On

THE ventilation ordinance which has been the center of much talk and action on the part of Chicago exhibitors for the past few months was finally referred to a sub-committee of aldermen on Friday, November 14, to be discussed with Dr. Young, and be reported back on Friday, November 21. This committee consisted of Aldermen Littler, Schaeffer and Latchford. These three men are said to be in favor of amending the ventilation ordinance as it now exists.

At the last meeting Mr. Nielson produced tests which were taken of his theatre at three different times during the night, and also a test which was taken on the street in front of his theatre. The test taken on the street showed more bacteria than did the one taken in his theatre when it was filled almost to capacity.

It is thought that the ordinance will be modified to 800 cubic feet of air per hour per person, as some theatres that have installed systems supplying the greater amount of air claim that they are not practical, and that the theatre cannot be heated and at the same time supply the air required by the ordinance.

Otto Roths in Chicago

Otto Roths, president of the Minnesota Motion Picture Association, was in Chicago on Thursday, November 13, and visited the headquarters of the local association. This combination of exhibitors see the necessity of combining their forces. This matter was discussed with Mr. Roths at length.

On the second Thursday in December a meeting will be held in Chicago at which eight or ten states will be represented for the purpose of making a national organization of the present association.

Interests Band to Fight Censorship

It is claimed that since Major M. L. C. Funkhouser has taken a hand in the censorship of film in Chicago, his rulings have been so drastic that they are working hardships on the film interests in the Windy City. During the week ending November 3, it is stated he killed seventeen subjects, some of which were features, also cut about fifteen others to such an extent the story of the film was injured. In the past a film has been passed by one censor and killed by another; there seem to be no set rules of what constitute a good or bad film, what the film should contain and what it should not contain.

In organizing it is not the intention of the motion picture interests to do away with censorship, but merely to get clean, intelligent and just censorship.

Let's give a little instance of how far these censors have gone with their power. Not long ago the Vitagraph released a subject in which a child while roller skating is picked up on the fender of a street car. The accident had to be cut out. Now, this was a film that taught a strong lesson, nevertheless it could not be shown.

Another point at issue is the fifty cents charged for a permit for each reel of film. It is the contention of the motion picture people that this expense should be taken care of by the license paid to operate theatres. Money is being subscribed by all interested, and the matter in all probability will be threshed out in the courts.

Gentlemen-:

Your picture screen THE GOLD RADIUM has been in constant use in our theatre now for a term of one year and three months and nothing can take its place for producing a clear and perfect picture with the absence of any eye strain whatever.

To those who have one nothing need be said and to the others we say THE GOLD RADIUM SCREEN is not a luxury but a necessity regardless of what you have for the purpose-This is just our honest conviction and nothing on the market today can change our mind in this respect.

Very Truly Yours

THE LEADING MAKERS OF MOTION PICTURE MACHINES.

JUST PLAIN COMMON SENSE tells you when you want to SEE yourself you use a Mirror. Because you SEE yourself better with a Mirror than any other means in the world. Now the same thing applies when you want to SEE motion pictures, use a MIRROR SCREEN because you SEE the pictures so much plainer, better and clearer on a Mirror Screen than on any other surface under the sun. Besides, it tickles your patrons and makes picture fans. It's a fact. The difference between a motion picture on a MIRROR SCREEN and any other screen of any other kind is the same comparison between seeing your own reflection in a fine French plate glass mirror and in a mud puddle. The "MIRROR SCREEN" is a Mirror. A magnificent mirror made from the finest polished plate glass that the world can produce. Get Right and Write to us to-day for our new Snow White Prismized Finished Surface.

Feature Buyers

when you demand the right to have your prints made on Lumiere stock you can back up your demands with reasons that apply to no other raw stock. First comes Photographic quality, then durability. What benefit is it to get territory if you lose your shirt because the prints wear out in a few weeks because the film is brittle and photography spotted like a leopard?

WHY

Any film service that is unreliable—uneven and low grade is an expensive service. Sometimes it costs an exhibitor all he has before he tumbles to the reason.

Any film service that is absolutely reliable—delivered on time—programmes well balanced—uniformly high in quality and pleasing to to the fans, is a cheap service.

Shown under proper conditions Motion Pictures are the quickest and surest means to honest wealth now open to man. But showmen must be guided by demonstrated proofs—not mere high sounding claims. The companies which make up General Film Service have been the acknowledged leaders of the industry since the first Motion Picture was made.

Here are the reasons why:

They were the first to manufacture films and, while developing with their art, they were developing the art itself.

They made it and grew up with it, guiding every inch of progress it has made.

Their knowledge of the making of motion pictures is the knowledge that made motion pictures what they are.

Their equipments for manufacture are the perfected cunning of the men who invented and improved the equipments with which pictures are made.

Their department chiefs are the experts who have been a part of the great art since its creation.

Their actors have been trained for years, and exploited till their names have become household words in the homes of every civilized community.

Their plants represent a total investment of over twenty-five million dollars.

Their "brands" have been advertised so long and so extensively that they are known and called for in every city and town on earth.

Proprietors of motion picture shows are now enabled to procure all of these brands—the product of the pioneer and premier manufacturers—the cream of the American and European film product—on one program. One program of matchless merit and absolute reliability. General Film Service insures success from the very start.

PROGRESS!

IN THE DAYS of revolution and the mighty flint lock gun,
Men talked long and very loudly of the deeds which they had done;
But those days are now historic and their heroes turned to clay,
While the mighty flint lock musket lieth rusting in decay.
So the march of progress hastens and each art has felt the thrill,
Yet the flickering moving picture seems to hover round us still.
All the power of great invention could not with the problem cope,
Till Van Riper's great invention GAVE THE WORLD THE VANOSCOPE.

Sent the intermittent movement to the junk pile with a whoop,
To the place that's warm in winter chased the ancient Latham loop,
Said good-bye, you rattling shutter, go and join the noble dead,
In the land of glorious has-beens where the flint lock musket fled.
This invention Vanoscopic lifts the moving picture mart
High up in the realm of optics where it has become an art,
And the hurrying, jerky pictures, with their flicker, flash and strain,
Now give all the charm of nature from a film that's free from rain.

Good-bye flint lock gun and pistol, good-bye tallow dip of yore,
Good-bye ox-cart, good-bye sickle, we will never need you more,
Good-bye rattle-trap projector, you have outlived every hope,
For you're now a good old has-been, WELCOME IN THE VANOSCOPE.

WURLITZER

Motion Picture Orchestra

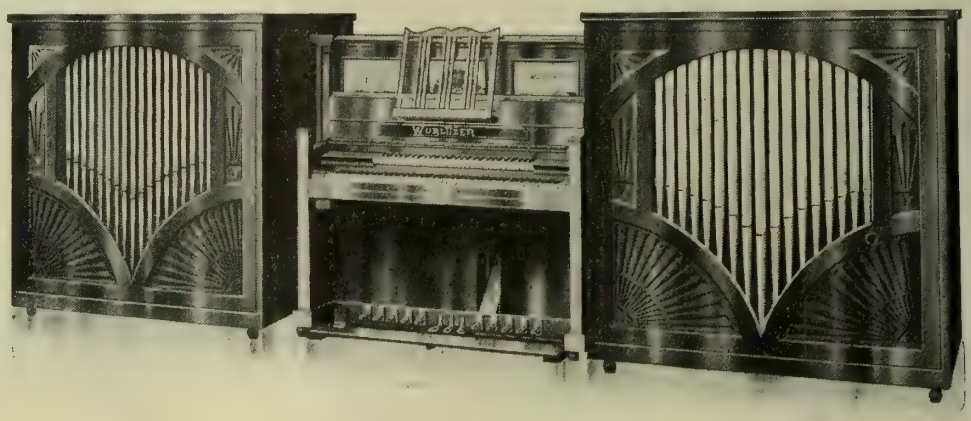
WURLITZER



Does the public like it?

That is the first question that every successful theatre manager must answer right. Otherwise he will fail, no matter what other arguments are in its favor. Wurlitzer Music is no longer an experiment. Wurlitzer Music has been indorsed by men like W. A. Brady, President of the National Association of Theatrical Producing Managers; Cohan & Harris, the well-known New York firm; B. N. Sherwood, of the Fitzhugh Hall Amusement Co., of Rochester, N. Y.; W. A. Roderic, of the Paris Theatre Co., of Denver, and many other individual owners.

The right answer pays dividends

Right now two firms have evidently found the answer. One has already purchased five, the other is contracting for ten additional instruments. One out of every eighteen Motion Picture Theatres in the United States are now using Wurlitzer Music. One million four hundred and sixty thousand people daily listen to Wurlitzer Music.

With the Wurlitzer Motion Picture Orchestra, built specially to meet the needs of Motion Picture Theatres, every musical effect is instantly attainable. A complete and well-balanced orchestra played by one man. The right music with every picture.

THE THEATRE BEAUTIFUL

WITHIN the year just closing a remarkable advance has been made in the construction of the motion picture theatre.

IDEALS and methods were vastly different less than two years ago. As for the first buildings—they cannot be dignified as theatres—they were like the first motion pictures—made cheaply to meet what was felt to be only a transient public fancy.

FROM these early houses with their dark interiors and flashy stucco fronts to the modern theatre beautiful, there's a tremendous leap—in many ways.

ARCHITECTS were not interested in the first theatres; to-day they are and their skill has to do with practically every such building erected to-day. Manufacturers of building materials, decorations, and equipment were not inclined to enter the picture theatre field. To-day they are competing sharply for the business.

MORE distinctly, perhaps, than any other one thing, the theatre of to-day evidences the uplift of cinematography. For this the manufacturers of films deserve great credit. Better pictures have made better theatres.

THERE is this to be said, however: many of the fine theatres of to-day are built—and some already managed—for the future; they are meeting the awakened interest of a large number of the public who a year or so ago considered the motion picture an impossible amusement.

THESE theatres demand fine pictures—not just better pictures. The environment they have, the presentation they give, demand a picture in keeping. They must have such pictures—must have to continue to attract their audiences.

FROM the beginning the editors of THE MOTION PICTURE NEWS have believed in and worked for the better theatre. The department on "Motion Picture Theatre Construction" has, we believe, given valuable, practical information and encouraged better construction.

WE believe the subject important enough to justify this special number; and we take pleasure in presenting these well-known architects who have given their services to its preparation:

Fuller Claflin, Elks Temple, Detroit, Mich

Fred. W. Elliott, Columbus, O.

Ben. C. De Camp, 908 Neave Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Thal & Aftel, Ohio Building, Toledo, Ohio.

Nathan Myers, Woolworth Building, New York.

Ralph M. Hulett, Lennox Building, Cleveland, Ohio.

Zettel & Rapp, Johnston Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Wm. O. Morch, Lombard Building, Indianapolis, Ind.

Kennerly & Stiegemeyer, Benoist Building, St. Louis, Mo.

THESE gentlemen, and others, will keep us posted hereafter on matters new and interesting in the construction of well planned theatres.

WE shall also continue with articles, from well-known engineers, on problems of ventilation, heating and lighting.

A DE LUXE PRESENTATION

S. R. Rothapfel Delights Large Audiences at the Regent Theatre—A Great Advance in Methods of Exhibition

A REMARKABLE incident in the history of the motion picture took place Monday and Tuesday evenings of last week at the Regent Theatre, 116th street and Seventh avenue, New York City. This sounds serious; and the writer so intends it.

S. L. Rothapfel presented artistically an artistic picture. That briefly was the "incident." But it served very clearly, to the writer, to portend for the first time the theatrical future of the picture. In short, it was little less than a revelation. There were many wondering expressions from those in the audience who had not been awakened to the possibilities of such a production. David Belasco, who was present, followed the performance from beginning to end with thoughtful attention, and later said: "It is one of the best things I have ever seen."

The picture shown was the George Kleine "Last Days of Pompeii." This excellent production Mr. Rothapfel centered in an environment so pleasing, so perfect in artistic detail, that it seemed as if the setting were a prerequisite to the picture, that to an educated audience the two should, and must hereafter, go together.

The Kleine picture is remarkable as such, not alone for its fine photography and splendid acting, but particularly because it does achieve dramatic unity. The central theme is the love of the Thessalonian flower-girl, the blind Nydia. As with Bulwer-Lytton's novel, so with the picture, you are left with a predominant impression of her gentleness and sweetness.

Mr. Rothapfel also achieves a theme in his music. There is the same unity throughout the admirable score with which the picture is accompanied. But predominating, woven delicately here and there in the score, is the soft, beautiful song from "Aida," symbolic of the gentle blind girl and her hopeless love for the Athenian, Glaucus.

The curtain rises to an inspiring prelude from the Regent pipe-organ, rendered by Mr. Drew, an accomplished organist. Then with a flare from the orchestra the dark red velvet curtains before the screen are parted to admit the figure of an actor arrayed in Grecian robes. With excellent intonation he announces the opening scene of the picture. Later, just before the Vesuvius scene, he appears again and for an interlude recites the thrilling lines from Bulwer-Lytton's novel which tell of the mob and its frenzied attack upon Arbaces.

At other intervals the monotony of the "silent stage"—there is bound to be some monotony in the long picture, however inspiriting it is—was delightfully broken by the voices of trained singers from the windowed recesses above and at each side of the stage. Soft lights were played upon these windows and also upon the fountain which plays just in front of the orchestra platform.

The frenzied scenes in the doomed city following the volcano's eruption were made most realistic by the accompaniment from "Lohengrin" and by a chorus of shrill voices back of the screen.

Mechanically as well as artistically the presentation was flawless throughout. It was, from every standpoint, the best that has been seen in motion pictures in this city.

The handsome and comfortable interior of the Regent has much to do with the success of the performance. There is no finer theatre in New York in point of construction, and Mr. Rothapfel's skilful attention to details has given the interior a refinement not to be equalled in a single other theatre here.

The audience, it should be noted, was of the kind found in the best playhouses. Judged by their decorum and sincere appreciation, they might have been at the opera.

There is a single criticism to be entertained, and that has nothing to do with the performance itself. This concerns the price of admission. It should be twenty-five instead of fifteen cents—that is certain. And perhaps one might go farther and say that such a production should be on Broadway at much higher prices.

Mr. Rothapfel's answer is, "It will."

WHEN JACK LONDON WAS AMAZED

Famous Author Writes of His Experiences When His Book, "The Sea Wolf," Was Being Produced for Motion Pictures

By JACK LONDON

I'D rather see a moving picture actor than to be one—to paraphrase Gelett Burgess and his Purple Cow.

This is the first thing that bobs up out of my experiences following the motion picture people about San Francisco Bay as they made the first part of the film for the moving picture reproduction of my yarn, "The Sea Wolf."

It was the beginning of the picturing of my stuff, and the first time I've ever seen moving pictures made, and I had one of the best times of my life.

I'm amazed at the actual amount of work involved, and I was particularly impressed by the daring and the adventurousness of the motion picture actors. One doesn't have to go to the North Pole or the heart of Africa to take risks any longer. Just join a moving picture company and take a trip with them about San Francisco Bay. You'll get all the thrills you can stand, and maybe a little bit more, now and then.

Same Boat As in Story

A very curious, and to me, a very interesting coincidence came about. The moving picture people hired the ferryboat Sausalito for their stunts, and engaged about sixty people. Neither Hobart Bosworth, the producer, nor I, nor Charmian, nor anybody else among our crowd, knew that the Sausalito really had a very intimate part in the drama of The Sea-Wolf" which we were putting upon the films.

It happened that while I was writing "The Sea Wolf," or maybe a little bit before that, the Sausalito collided with the San Rafael in the fog and sank her, and a lot of people lost their lives. I used the incident in my yarn, only for fiction purposes I altered the name Sausalito to Martinez.

By sheer coincidence Bosworth hired this very boat, the Sausalito, from the Northwestern Pacific people, and, as I say, none of us knew that she was one of the two steamers actually engaged in the incident that figures so importantly in my story, nor did we learn of it until in the interval between the taking of two pictures, while joshing the captain in the pilot house, the captain stated his steamer was the one that sank the San Rafael.

For our purposes, she was both the San Rafael and the Sausalito—both the steamer that was sunk and the one that did the sinking.

One vivid touch of color in the day's adventures was a woman in the town of Sausalito, who saw what she thought to be the regular boat coming into the ferry slip. To her utter amazement the steamer was named Martinez instead of Sausalito. For we had laid a cloth painted Martinez over the real name-board on the pilot house.

To her further amazement, gazing from her quiet, sunny little house among the trees on the hillside, she observed a furious crowd of men, women and children struggling madly on the fore lower and upper decks of the ferryboat. What was the matter? The steamer missed the slip entrance. It collided with the side of the slip. She saw all those scores of frantic passengers fall on their faces in massed heaps on the decks.

Maddened Mass of People

Not believing her eyes, she got her marine glasses to bear on the amazing scene. The steamer backed out from the slip. It came crashing in again. Once more the struggling, maddened mass of people rushed for life preservers, grappled with each other to get near the boats, and fell pell-mell in kicking and writhing heaps.

When I met her as I landed she was running madly down from her home on the hill to see what was going on. The moving picture camera was busily buzzing, and the people were doing another stunt, and that was all.

The launches and other steamboats on the bay were highly mystified by our erratic behavior, and by the utterly irregular and bewildering nature of our whistles, and they rushed toward us time and again to tender us their assistance.

Of course, Charmian and I were in the thick of the fun—though not in the action—not in those stunts of jumping into the cold water time and time again, and falling down a dozen times or more as the ferryboat bucked the slip at the director's order, hurling everybody right and left.

No, none of that for us. As I started to say, I'd rather see a motion picture actor than be one. Though I'm mighty glad I've seen him at his work. He's a corker.

STRUGGLE FOR LIFE BOATS WHICH STARTLED LONDON

The following article was printed in the San Francisco Examiner the day after the scenes London describes were produced:

"In the taking of the motion pictures of Jack London's most famous novel, "The Sea Wolf," on San Francisco Bay, yesterday, Hobart Bosworth, the producer, hired the ferryboat Sausalito, and employed a troupe of sixty-two players, thirty-five of whom were given the special job of doing the dives and jumps overboard in the collision scenes.

"Considering the fact that they had to repeat their stunts over and over again, and to fall violently to the decks at least half a score of times in struggling heaps, the players certainly earned the thousands of dollars which the first day's reproduction cost.

"The three main characters of the story-drama were: Larsen, the Sea-Wolf, played by Hobart Bosworth; Humphrey Van Weyden, played by Herbert Rawlinson, and Maud Brewster, played by Viola Barry, the daughter of J. Stitt Wilson, former Socialist Mayor of Berkeley.

Show Van Weyden's Adventures

"Humphrey Van Weyden, in London's story, is a very anemic superintellectualized literary artist, who in a collision between two ferryboats in San Francisco Bay is hurled into the icy water and swept seaward through the Golden Gate with the tide until he is picked up by Wolf Larsen, the dominating, red-blooded, modern Viking, and carried away on his ship, the Ghost, to wild adventures in the lonely ocean wilds, from which he returns a man in body as well as in soul and mind, and winner of the love of Maud Brewster.

"The pictures taken yesterday were those showing the first part of Van Weyden's adventures. The other scenes will be taken near San Pedro on a specially constructed ship which will be wrecked in the end. More than $40,000 will be spent in making the films, which include an introductory set of pictures showing Jack London himself writing, or riding full tilt on his Glen Ellen ranch, or otherwise engaged in his diurnal routine in Sonoma county.

"According to Bosworth's statements, London will reap a fortune from the production of his stories in moving picture form."

VITAGRAPH AIDS SAFETY CRUSADE

THE value of making accident education attractive is attracting the notice of persons all over this country through the accident prevention campaign being conducted by the many electric railways for the benefit of all who must use the streets and roads of cities and towns in their daily work.

One of the most interesting features of this campaign is the portrayal in motion pictures of the dangers and resultant accidents from carelessness. In connection with the Brooklyn Rapid Transit System's children safety crusade, the Vitagraph Company of America is producing a series of feature films on this subject, one of which, "The Price of Thoughtlessness," has been shown.

An article appearing in the November issue of the Electric Railway Journal tells in a very graphic manner how this great crusade is being carried on. It says:

"The accident prevention campaign which is now being conducted by the many electric railways is undoubtedly reaching a larger portion of the public with excellent results, but few companies have as yet succeeded in arousing the hearty interest of the children. The average child is very unwilling to receive instruction unless that instruction is presented in an attractive form.

"The experience of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit System's children's safety crusade, to which reference was made in the October 25th issue of this journal, has proved that the permanent interest of school children can be maintained by the use of attractive lecture material, presented through the medium of trained speakers. The material consists of car models, original colored cards showing almost every kind of accident possible on the streets, and finally a series of motion pictures (by the Vitagraph Company of America).

"The Vitagraph Company of America is doing a big work for humanity in aiding in this general safety crusade. A more realistic and telling medium for the presentation of this vitally important subject could not be found than the motion picture screen."

LATEST NEWS FROM CHICAGO

ALDERMEN who were appointed on the committee to confer with Dr. Young on the advisability of amending the ventilation ordinance as it now stands, made a personal investigation of some twenty theatres on Monday night, November 10. It is said that they found the conditions to be so good in these theatres that they often expressed themselves in the superlative in speaking words of praise. They saw no reason why the ordinance should be as drastic as it now stands, and it is thought that in all probability they will recommend it to call for 800 cubic feet of air per hour per person.

In their conference with Dr. Young he would not listen to any change being made in the ordinance. It is for this reason they took it upon themselves to personally investigate some of the theatres.

Walter Scates a Daddy Now

Walter Scates, manager of the General Film Co. branch of Boston, wires in that a nine-pound baby girl was born on November 9. Mr. Scates for a number of years was manager of the General Film Co. Dearborn avenue branch in Chicago. Mr. Scates did not give us any further particulars, such as the young lady's views on suffrage or the Mexican situation.

The Edison film, "Why Girls Leave Home," has become very popular in and about Chicago. Ben Beadell, local representative for Edison, claims this is the most popular film at the present time.

Mr. Skelton, of the Edison Company, spent a few days in Chicago last week. Mr. Skelton is associated with the phonograph department of the Edison enterprises.

THE LYCEUM THEATRE, NEWARK, N. J.

Nathan Myers, the Architect, Writes on Problems that Confront Designer of Photoplay House

ONE of the most magnificent of the many new motion picture theatres is the Lyceum, of Newark, N. J., designed by Architect Nathan Myers, who has offices in the Woolworth Building, New York City, and the Cort Theatre Building, Newark, N. J.

The frontispiece of this publication shows the exterior of this theatre. Its floor plan accompanies this article.

Without doubt New Jersey's most elaborate building devoted to light entertainment is now nearing completion in the Lyceum, located in Newark's second busiest quarter in Springfield avenue, near Belmont avenue.

Land Cleverly Utilized

These conditions presented themselves: The land, with worthless buildings thereon, where maintenance charges exceeded receipts, cost the owner almost $80,000. It ran from street to street, about eighty-five feet, with a street frontage of fifty feet. Anything planned above the first story for commercial purposes spelled failure. A one-story motion picture place or one story with a small balcony could not stand the entire initial investment burden. Nor could a balcony be placed under any circumstances, because fourteen feet of the fifty would have had to be devoted to alleys and fire-escapes, according to the Newark laws.

It was therefore determined to build for the provision of a 600-seat motion picture house on the first floor and a public dance-hall on the second floor. To make this possible a special permit had to be received for the architect to omit the usual four-feet-wide alleys to both sides of the auditoriums, as is required in one-story theatres. Such permission gave the architect the right to use every inch of this valuable plot of ground, and every inch has been used.

The lot was very irregular, and, while the maximum seating capacity was desired, no seat was worth installing that was not in full view of the screen, as well as at the proper angle. A symmetrical auditorium was also desired for architectural reasons. The floor plan of the auditorium shows how well this was accomplished.

To the left is the theatre entrance lobby, and to the right is the ball-room entrance lobby, which latter also serves as an emergency exit for the theatre. Between the two lobbies is a large marble stairway to the ball-room, and off of the second landing is a doorway to the picture booth.

The value of this booth arrangement may easily be seen. Access to the same may be had during the show at all times, without creating any disturbance. In case of a fire the slides covering the holes in the booth front could be quickly dropped if they had not already closed automatically, and the operators could back out safely and close the door to let the fire burn itself out, the audience hardly the wiser.

First American Day-and-Night Screen

At the stage end of the theatre and ball-room, each has a ceiling height of twenty-two feet, which allows a mezzanine story to each in that corner of the plot, not of use to either on account of symmetry. The architect has grasped the opportunity for using the same as accessories to the ball-room, should that portion be devoted at any time to affairs needing catering. The ground floor is used as a caterer's receiving-room, the next as the kitchen, the ball-room floor-level as the service pantry and the mezzanine above as the waiters' and cooks' wardrobe and toilet-rooms.

Getting back to the theatre, there is a space for the screen, where there will be installed the first day-and-night screen made in this country, and a small stage only large enough for a monologue or a two-person turn. One dressing-room is provided.

The ball-room also has a small balcony, seating about a hundred, and is provided with ample check-rooms.

The interior of all parts of the building will be highly decorated in plaster and stencil ornament in the Art Nouveau style, dark red, gold and cream for the theatre and old rose, gold and cream predominating for the ball-room.

The facade is indicative of its purpose. It is highly decorative and attractive, yet not loud and gaudy. It is mostly in matte-glazed, polychrome terra-cotta. The body color is light cream, blue and dull gold ornamenting it. The brickwork is of Fiske tapestry, laid in recessed joints. One large copper marquise spans the entire front to cover both the theatre and the ball-room entrances, as well as the sidewalk stairway to the basement restaurant.

This restaurant occupies all the space under the sidewalk not used for the retiring-rooms, as well as the space under the lobbies, and but a small part under the auditorium.

The boiler and coal-rooms are located under the sidewalk of the other end of the building. All parts of the building are provided with a system of forced-draught ventilation. Each set of retiring-rooms is provided with separate exhaust fans.

The lighting has been equally well studied. That for the theatre will be entirely indirect, and that for the ball-room will be direct-indirect, for both of which National X-Ray fixtures will be used, for the remainder of the building Macbeth-Evans and Holophane goods will be used where they are most suited.

Here follows a contribution from the pen of Architect Nathan Myers. They fully represent my views on the growth of cinematography and emphasize the necessity of providing better photoplay houses for the constantly increasing army of lovers of motion pictures. These lines confirm also our first impression: that Mr. Myers has made a real study of motion pictures and of their projection

What Mr. Myers Says

"About twelve years ago the motion-picture and the motor-car industries were in their infancies. Both have made a most remarkable advance, and ten years hence both will have succeeded so far that this period of development will be looked upon as but a second stage of their respective histories. Up to this time, it might be quite truthfully said that the motor-car has been developed for the enjoyment of the rich, the motion picture for the enjoyment of the poor. The former is being developed that soon it will be within the reach of the almost poor, while the latter is being produced that it commands those of the most refined and fastidious taste.

"In the first days of motion pictures the product was mostly of an unsavory and uneducational type. It displayed Wild West scenes, every unlawful exploit imaginable, and rather taught crime than the correction of it. These pictures were housed in places befitting. Any ramshackle fire-trap would do, with a plaster front of misapplied ornament and myriads of electric lights. Their interiors were unsanitary, poorly planned and often provided with inadequate or no emergency exits. The seats were usually on a level, and the ceilings low.

"With the development of the industry came the betterment of everything. The objectionable films were replaced with a series of Western life that taught lessons of love, truth and morality. The life of all nations, the industries of the world, the science of all things, have through this new medium been brought to the door of every small village. Novels and plays are intelligently reproduced and often by renowned actors.

"Motion pictures cannot henceforth be termed, as heretofore, the lightest of all theatrical amusements. It is rising to greater stations.

"With this advancement, it is commanding the efforts of the best architects throughout the land, who are constantly striving for betterment in design, practicability, economy of construction, maintenance and management and safety of the public.

"There are state and city ordinances that in general prescribe a minimum of conditions for safety of the patrons, and do not pretend to govern any details beyond that. They differ greatly at times, and often when two govern the same locality are contradictory.

"There should be provided a sufficient number of emergency exits for all parts of the house, furnished with panic bolts of that type that no matter what part of the door receives the first blow, the door will open. That type of bolt that must be pressed at the handle is not of sufficient protection. The main entrance lobby should not be counted as an exit, for just at the moment of panic the entrance lobby might be packed by a crowd desiring entrance to the second show and the doors could not be swung outward for relief.

"The machine booth should be fireproof with fusible link doors to all openings, and so arranged that the operator may close all by cutting one cord. A vent from the top of the booth to above the roof must be installed.

Heating and Ventilation Important

"The gradiant floor, the careful arrangement of the seats, the decorations, the lighting, the stage, the provision for organ space, and many more details require the most minute study.

"Too little attention in general is given to the heating and ventilating of the show place. They must be studied for cold and warm weather conditions.

"Only the best of screens should be installed and they should have their shadow box and proper setting. The relation of the booth to the screen is important, for very many times the best pictures have been spoiled by poor projection.

"The Motion Picture News has repeatedly given valuable suggestions as to the various fields of the industry, and these articles can be read with much benefit to all concerned. May such advice and good judgment continue!" J. M. B.

THE EMPIRE THEATRE, DETROIT

Fuller Claflin, Who Designed It, Advises "Consulting Architect"

FULLER CLAFLIN, Elks' Temple, Detroit, Mich., a well-known architect and builder of many playhouses all over the country, does not discourage the services of a general or local architect, but, as in the case of a disease, the general practitioner advises consultation with a specialist. Mr. Claflin urges that a specialist should be retained.

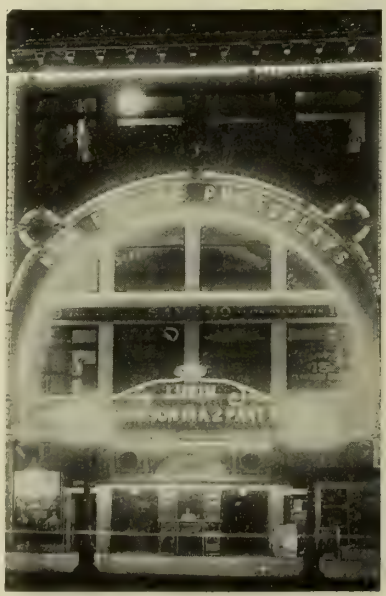
In an advance notice on his coming book, "The Perfect Theatre," Fuller Claflin says:

"Among architects there are specialists in every class of work from bungalows to office buildings, from factories to hotels, from breweries to public libraries, from jails to churches and from mausoleums to theatres. Certain opinions of these specialists have a commercial value.

"Hence the consulting architect.

"A consulting architect does not profess to know about more things than architects of general practice, but he is supposed to have learned about some things which only specialists are likely to have had a chance to learn.

"He is a dealer in common sense. His business consists in stripping from some special class of building projects the impossible, the unreasonable, the ridiculous, the unnecessary, the wrong, the crude, the unwise, the unsound, the unsafe and the otherwise objectionable elements, and in suggesting the proper things.



EMPIRE THEATRE, DETROIT

"His services are usually retained with the understanding that from time to time he is to give advice about matters as to which he has specialized; and his services are usually rendered in co-operation with those of a general architect. As a result, when the work in hand is in its initial stage, a satisfactory general plan and design can ordinarily be adopted, a general plan of operations evolved, an effective means of keeping the cost of operations within a fixed appropriation provided, and other matters of general policy determined upon with due regard to the suggestions and recommendations of the consulting architect."

The illustration shows the Empire Theatre of Detroit, planned by Mr. Claflin. It was the only photograph obtainable, a good night view, but not doing justice to the fine details of the lobby and of the ticket office. As a night picture, it shows that the Empire is a great attraction on Woodward avenue, the main shopping district of Detroit. The auditorium of the Empire Theatre is beautifully decorated, very comfortable, with 550 chairs, and is under the experienced management of M. H. Starr. J. M. B.

STIEGEMEYER ON NEW ST. LOUIS THEATRE

O. W. STIEGEMEYER, of St. Louis, Mo., a leading architect on theatres, has designed some of the most famous theatres of St. Louis, and presents in the accompanying illustration a view of the new theatre that he is erecting. He says:

"A new picture and vaudeville house of 2,000 capacity is in course of construction, occupying a lot 93x157 feet on the north side of Delmar avenue, west of Hamilton avenue, St. Louis, Mo.

"The house was designed by Mr. Stiegemeyer, of the firm of Kennerly & Stiegemeyer, St. Louis, Mo., who have made a specialty of designing amusement buildings.

"The house will have a reinforced concrete skeleton, with concrete balcony and roof. The stage and front of building will have brick curtain walls. The front elevation and the returns on both sides will be faced with white glazed terra cotta.

"A prominent feature of this house is the novel construction of the side walls, which consist of large triple window-frames between the columns supporting the roof trusses. These sashes can be opened in the summer time, making the house practically an open-air proposition, and giving at all times excellent ventilation.

"The interior of the house will be elaborately decorated with plastic relief ornament, which in turn will be decorated in cream, old ivory, light green and high-lighted with gold bronze, making a very attractive house.

PLAN OF NEW ST. LOUIS THEATRE

"The entrance doors are sheltered by a massive copper and colored glass marquise. The lobby will have marble wainscoting and marble pilasters supporting a heavy ornamental plaster cornice, together with a coffered ceiling, studded with electric lights, which are encased in semi-circular bowls.

"The main floor will have a seating capacity of 900, the balcony 800, and 300 seats in the orchestra boxes, proscenium boxes and in the loges across the front of the balcony.

"The stairs to the balcony lead out of the foyer on each side of the house. From a landing on these stairs a separate flight lead to the mezzanine floor, which is elaborately fitted up as a lounging or waiting room, with ladies' retiring rooms and men's smoking rooms on either side.

"When completed this house will be one of the most beautiful and complete vaudeville and picture houses in the country, and will represent an investment of $100,000." J. M. B.

THE COLUMBIA THEATRE, MUNCIE, IND.

C. R. Andrews, Owner, Writes on House Designed by Ben C. De Camp

MR. ANDREWS writes on his new Columbia Theatre, of Muncie, Ind., designed by Architect Ben C. De Camp, Neave Building, Cincinnati, O. Unfortunately a photograph of the theatre is not available. Here is what Mr. Andrews has to say:

"The house is one of the best-equipped houses in the Middle West, being almost entirely fireproof. The only wood used in its construction is contained in the roof. The operating booth is constructed entirely of concrete, with two twenty-four-inch steel ventilators running from the booth out through the roof. The booth is nine by twenty-two feet. The auditorium is fifty-four feet six inches by sixty-eight feet, seating 504. All leather upholstered. Auditorium floor of concrete with eight exits. All-metal doors and equipped with Von Dupin self-releasing latches.

"The proscenium arch is a beautiful plastic design, with singers' boxes located on each side, above which are located a series of pipes in front of the organ chests. We have a pipe-organ containing 1,800 pipes, one of the best-balanced instruments installed in this vicinity. It contains all the stops and attachments necessary to bring out the effects of the pictures.

"The theatre is heated and ventilated by a device installed in the basement, which takes in the fresh air from a stack forty-five feet high. This ventilating device is of sufficient capacity to change the entire volume of air in the auditorium every three minutes, the fresh air being forced in near the ceiling level and the foul air ducts at the floor level, with regulating devices to keep the room at a given temperature regardless of the size of the crowd in the theatre.

"The fresh air is tempered to any desired degree in the Winter by being forced through hot steam coils and cooled by ice coils in warm weather, is one of the big features of our place and gives an unlimited field for advertising. It is thoroughly practical, and certainly endorsed by the patrons and medical profession.

"The house is lighted by an indirect lighting system, which gives a soft, mellow appearance and blends beautifully with the decorations and makes it possible to reach your seat or recognize anyone in the audience at all times, yet does not interfere with the vividness of the picture.

"The lobby is of marble and mirrors on the sides, with a tile floor. The lobby is sixteen feet wide and fifty-nine feet long, with a brass rail running the full length, which separates the ingoing and outcoming crowds. The entrance is constructed entirely of marble, tile and terra-cotta.

"I believe that we have one of the finest picture houses of its size in the country, and naturally feel proud of it."

THE COLUMBIA THEATRE OF PORTSMOUTH

Architect De Camp Describes Advantages in House He Planned

THE illustration shows the front elevation of the Columbia Theatre, of Portsmouth, O., owned and managed by Fred N. Tynes, the mayor of that city. The plans were drawn by Architect Ben. C. De Camp, 908 Neave Building, Cincinnati, O., who has the following to say:

"The especial features of this house are its fireproof construction, model heating and ventilating and air-purifying devices, together with its beautiful decorative features. Its lighting is all overhead, indirect system. The color scheme is ivory, green and gold, and when lighted is certainly most beautiful.

"The State law governs the construction of such theatres outside of cities of the first class, and all must be fireproof from top to bottom, with required exits at sides and rear. There are six hundred leather-upholstered seats, and each person occupying a seat is guaranteed a perfect sight of the screen. The seats are arranged in circle form and banked so as to obtain this result.

"The screen is framed back into a deep setting of dark cloth, thus avoiding anything of the color combination that would detract from the picture. In fact, the pictures show up as works of art, draped round about with suitable draperies, harmonizing with the picture throughout.

The pictures are projected on a Mirror screen from the booth, which is placed in the balcony, and the effect is really beautiful. Seats are arranged on both sides of the booth for those who do not have the price for a first-floor seat, thus separating the sheep from the goats, so to speak.

"The air is changed at uniform periods, and each person is supplied with 1,500 cubic feet of air per hour. This system is very similar to that used by the Vento Company. The air passes over pans of fresh running water, so as to be cleaned and purified before it reaches the audience. The result is that each person is alert and free from the sickening feeling generated from bad ventilation and foul air, and able to enjoy the exhibition to their satisfaction.

COLUMBIA THEATRE, PORTSMOUTH, O.

"You will notice the absence of ticket booth, usually set in lobby, but in this house it is concealed, being on one side and back of arch lines. There is a small stage back of curtain screen, where once a week some special features are given with great success, as words spoken or sung can be heard plainly to the back of balcony, thus demonstrating the perfect acoustics of the room.

"In closing this brief description it would be well to say that Mr. Tynes has spared no expense to make this house a thing of beauty, and it has certainly justified the expenditure.

"Anticipating high water at some time, we devised a drainage system, which was put to the test last May, for there was seven feet of water inside the house, and this was all carried off without any effort as the river began to fall. Another house in the same city was ruined on account of the flood, because no provision was made for the drainage when built." J. M. B.

THE NORWOOD THEATRE, NORWOOD, O.

THE illustrations show the new Norwood Theatre, of Norwood, O., designed by architects Zettel & Rapp, Johnston Building, Cincinnati, O. The only particulars furnished by the architests are as follows:

The auditorium measures approximately 63x100 feet, stage 67x18 feet, lobby about 18 feet deep.

The theatre is heated and ventilated by a multivane fan blowing fresh air over the battery of warm-air furnaces.

To this meager description I wish to call the attention to a light fixture used in the auditorium, a new lamp which is installed in many of the Western theatres. It is a sort of indirect lighting system. The electric light bulb rests at the bottom of the white porcelain bowl, shown under the fixture, and cannot be seen from the floor. While some of the light passes through the thickness of the white porcelain bowl and falls on the seats in diffused rays, the upper rays of the light strike the white enameled surface of the fixture and fall back in the auditorium also in diffused rays.

The advantage of this new lamp is that less candle-power is required. The fixture can be adjusted at any height and the ceiling can be painted any color.

THE ALHAMBRA THEATRE, SHELBYVILLE, IND.

Architect Morch Describes the Home of the Mirror Screen

THE illustration shows the Alhambra Theatre, of Shelbyville, Ind., or what is called the home of the Mirror screen, as it is the photoplay palace of Frank J. Rembusch.

The architect is William O. Morch, Lombard Building, Indianapolis, Ind. He has been very successful in the designing of several theatres; among them is the Oriental on Meridan street, Indianapolis.

THE ALHAMBRA, SHELBYVILLE, IND.

Mr. Morch gives the following description of the Alhambra Theatre of Shelbyville:

"Mr. Rembusch first engaged me to make three sketches before I quite got the idea of his desire. In fact, I was almost provoked, thinking Mr. Rembusch was super-critical, but from the results that we obtained I am glad that he was very critical at that time.

"The exterior of the building gives you an idea of something very substantial. The lines are all uniform and straight and just enough diversion to break any monotony. One of the things that is unique about the building is the tower on the corner. The idea of the tower was to give the building personality, so to speak, and the effect is both startling and pleasing. When the electric lights are on, surrounding the tower, at nights, like a blaze of glory, it makes a wonderful advertisement for the playhouse.

"The theatre is 40x120, and the Mirror Screen Company occupies the office rooms above same. The exterior effect is an intermingling of colors which gives you an idea of a Persian rug. The bricks are rough and of gold, green, red, brown and the wood shade combined, which give the most beautiful effect imaginable. At the same time there is nothing about the building in its general outline that grows old, as sometimes a very flashy building will do.

"No expense was spared in either the exterior or the interior. The walls are decorated and hand-painted on cloth. An illustration shows the arrangement of the Mirror screen. The over-draperies are all of velvet. The stage is particularly attractive, as it has a large proscenium arch and two smaller proscenium arches on the side, which the singers may use or orchestras may be placed. It has a pipe-organ on one side and a piano on the other of these small openings.

"The screen sets back about ten feet from the stage in a shadow-box which brings out the pictures very plainly. The seats are all leather-covered. The building is thoroughly fireproof and sanitary. The lighting is very effective at all times, and sort of gives the idea of exquisite taste without spoiling the homelike atmosphere."

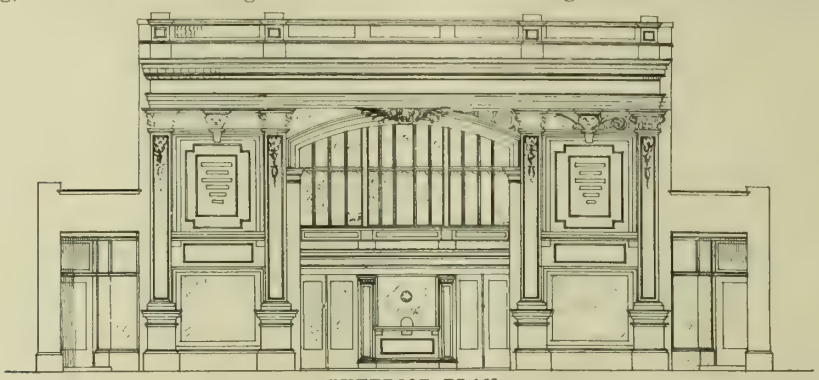
AUDITORIUM, THE ALHAMBRA

ARCHITECT WRITING BOOK ON PICTURE THEATRES

RALPH M. HULETT, an architect with offices in the Lennox Building, Cleveland, O., has in preparation a book entitled "The Picture Theatres of Ohio."

This book will deal exclusively on the subject of picture theatres, and will contain photographs of some fifty or more theatres throughout the State, and a series of articles pertaining to the heating, ventilation and management of theatres, along with the State Code of Ohio.

The accompanying illustrations are from sketches prepared for the book, showing a projected theatre.



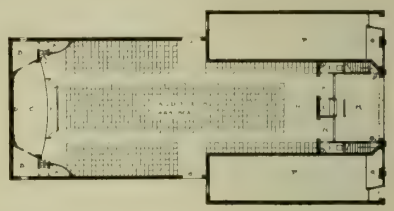
EXTERIOR PLAN

In this theatre the architect's endeavor is to emphasize the theatre proper as far as possible, while using the space not needed for a lobby for commercial purposes. He has done this by utilizing the 8 feet space required for exits for his store entrances and extended the store into the theatre, by which means he gets fairly large stores and yet does not detract from the theatre effect.

It was designed for a lot 60x125 feet and seats 465 persons. The stores are 15x62 feet in size, and this leaves an ample lobby, with convenient access to operating booth. In the auditorium a good view of the stage is obtained from every seat, and all acoustics are properly taken care of.

The following is the "key" to letters on the plan:

"A"—Boxes.
"B"—Dressing Rooms.
"C"—Steps to Boxes and Dressing Rooms.



"D"—Screen.
"E"—Stage.
"F"—Orchestra Pit.
"G"—Emergency Exits.
"H"—Standing room.
"I"—Toilets.
"J"—Stairs to Operating Booth.
"K"—Entrance.
"L"—Box Office.
"M"—Lobby.
"N"—Exit.
"O"—Stairs to Offices.
"P"—Stores.
"Q"—Display Windows.

THE COLUMBIA THEATRE, TOLEDO

Thal & Aftel Design Practical and Rich-Appearing House

A THEATRE which is very rich and refined in appearance owing to its straight lines and absence of cheap decorations is the Columbia, of Toledo, O., It is a substantial structure, built in the belief that motion pictures are here to stay.

The architects, Thal & Aftel, with offices in the Ohio Building, Toledo, have submitted the following description:

"The building is 60 feet wide and 120 feet deep. The main front vestibule is 29x10 feet, full height of building, as shown on plans.

"The space over the front exits and toilets is utilized on one side for the manager's office, with windows overlooking into vestibule and auditorium, and the other side, which was built with a stair same as the manager's office, is utilized for the bill and repair room and entrance to operating booth.

"The operating booth is 7.6x12 feet and 10 feet high, equipped with two machines. The auditorium has a seating capacity of 800. It is 16 feet high at entrance level and 22 feet high at lower level, with the floor sloping 6 feet. The building is equipped with a complete stage 20x50 feet and 36 feet high, suitable for vaudeville. The dressing-rooms and heating and ventilating apparatus are located under stage.

"The theatre was originally intended for vaudeville and motion pictures at 10 cents admission, but was converted to motion pictures only at 5 cents admission.

COLUMBIA THEATRE, TOLEDO, OHIO

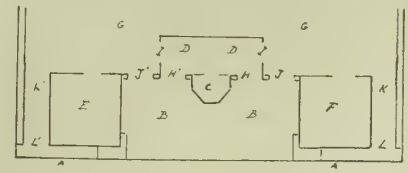
The illustration shows the floor plan of the front of said theatre, as the special arrangement of the doors calls for mention:

A A—The building line.
B B—The lobby.
C—The ticket office.
D D—The foyer.
E—Ladies' resting room.
F—Gents' smoking-room.
G—Auditorium.

H and H′ are two double doors connecting the lobby with the foyer or entrance doors.

I and I′ are two double doors connecting the foyer with the auditorium. As shown, these two doors I and I′ open on the side of the foyer, throwing the light from the street on the side walls and not on the screen, as is the case with doors facing the stage.

As foyer D D is partitioned, the cold air from the street does not strike the shoulders of the spectators.



J and J′ are regular exit doors, but act more as emergency doors, as the patrons generally exit by the aisles K K′ and doors L L′. These doors L L′ are provided with the Van Duprin self-releasing exit door device, which enables anyone to walk out by merely pressing on the bar, yet no one can open the door from the outside.

Thal & Aftel have designed seven of the best theatres of Toledo, and have just completed an elegant photo-play house in Monroe street of that city.

THE MAJESTIC THEATRE, COLUMBUS

Owned by Max Stearn, It Is the Thirty-ninth Fred W. Elliot Has Designed

A FEW weeks ago I mentioned Max Stearn, of Columbus, O., who remained in his own town and succeeded, until to-day, when he is on the eve of the opening of his new Majestic Theatre, which will prove to be one of the best equipped and managed motion picture theatres in the country.

The illustrations show the floor plan and front elevation of the magnificent Majestic Theatre, now being erected in Columbus, O., by Mr. Stearn, at a cost of $125,000.

This is the first fireproof motion picture theatre to be erected in Columbus. Further, it is the first real theatre designed to be used exclusively for motion pictures.

In the Heart of Business Section

The building contains a balcony, six boxes, and is equipped with a roomy stage not provided for present use, but for the future should occasion demand.

The building is of the most modern fireproof construction, being built of terra cotta, brick, concrete and fireproof steel; all exterior windows have metal frames filled with wire glass, and all doors are metal-covered. Mr. Stearn has spared no expense in making this a modern, up-to-date, safe structure. It is located in the heart of the business section of the city, directly opposite the State Capitol, and adjoins the Neil House, the political headquarters of Ohio.

MAJESTIC THEATRE, COLUMBUS, O.

The building occupies a lot 75x190 feet. The front of the structure is faced with red-wire cut-brick trimmed with richly-decorated cream glazed terra cotta. The outer lobby is 25x25 feet, and extends through two stories in height, the walls of which are covered with Rookwood tiles. The entrance is protected from the weather by a cast-iron marquise extending over the sidewalk.

The theatre is designed to accommodate 1,200 persons, 700 chairs being provided on the main floor and 500 in the balcony.

The picture machine room is 8x12 feet and 8 feet high, and is constructed entirely of reinforced concrete, and all openings into the same are covered by steel doors. Adjoining the picture machine room is a rewind room 6x8 feet and 8 feet high.

The stage is 25x50 feet and 50 feet high, and is provided with eight dressing rooms, and all other accessories necessary in an up-to-date theatre. The interior will be gorgeously ornamented in stucco, will be illuminated by concealed lighting and will be decorated in oil.

The picture screen will be within a shadow-box placed in the center of the stage, and this will be masked by velvet draperies and curtains.

Open About Christmas

The building will be equipped with a system of indirect steam-heating provided with electrically-propelled fans, which will supply to each auditor not less than 1,200 cubic feet of warm fresh air per hour.

The structure was designed by Fred W. Elliott, architect, of Columbus, O., and is the thirty-ninth theatre which Mr. Elliott has designed.

The building is nearing completion, and Mr. Stearn looks forward with pleasure and pride to the opening, which will take place on or about Christmas Day.

SUBSTITUTES FOR CELLULOID

JUST as celluloid, which is the flexible support of the motion picture, was devised to take the place of glass, so attempts, we see, are constantly made to prepare a substitute for celluloid. Indeed, the matter has engaged the attention of experimenters for more than twenty years. The principal reason why a substitute for celluloid is aimed at is on account of the readiness of the latter to take fire, although there are others of a chemical and physical nature.

Three or four weeks ago we printed an article on "Stereoscopic Projection on the Screen" and pointed out that it was difficult, if not impossible, to effect this. You cannot make and see stereoscopic pictures on the screen properly. Now, we do not say that you cannot make a substitute for celluloid—you can, but the substitute is not as good as the celluloid itself.

There are, at the present time, in many parts of the world people working to make these substitutes. During the last five years, we have had in our hands not less than twenty substances which are supposed to take the place of celluloid, and yet, up to date, not one of them has found its way on the market. Gelatine itself has been suggested as a substitute for celluloid, but in practice it has not answered. It is a difficult chemical problem to solve. The chemistry of celluloid is not at all obscure. Any intelligent inventor can get an idea of the ingredients and the methods of manufacture.

OUR object in writing this article is to warn would-be inventors, of which there are so many in this field of endeavor, to acquaint themselves thoroughly with what has been done before in the matter before they set to work on these so-called substitutes. The difficulties in the way are great indeed, as any chemist familiar with the problem knows. You can, it is true, get a substitute for celluloid as it is used to-day, but in practice the substitute is not an efficient one. It cannot stand the action of development. It deteriorates the silver salts. The gelatine will not adhere to it. It cracks. It is not flexible enough. These are some of the practical difficulties that have been met with in the substitutes that have been made on a small scale and experimented with in the camera, in the developing-room and the projection machine.

We do not wish to be understood as deterring or deriding invention, but simply to warn modern entrants into the field that so much has been done in this direction already that the path of originality has been very much narrowed.

It might not be out of place here to say that paper can be used for taking and projecting motion pictures; so can glass plates. Here you have feasible substitutes for celluloid, but in actual practice they are difficult to use for the purpose and are never entirely satisfactory.

GERMANY FALLS IN LINE

AMERICANS are often charged with a weakness for novelties as well as a quick appreciation of new inventions. In the matter of moving pictures, however, great as is their vogue in this country, we have nothing on the Europeans. In England, France, Italy and elsewhere, the new form of amusement is playing havoc with the so-called legitimate theatres, and we learn from to-day's cable news that even the staid Germans have yielded to the fashion of the hour.

Berlin has now over twenty companies manufacturing the films, and theatre after theatre is being turned into a motion picture house. Berlin, however, has set a new pace by the luxurious furnishing of the "kinos" as they are called, club chairs and boxes being so elegantly finished that the swellest society of the German Capital occupies them instead of going to the opera.

The Berlin films, by the way, are subject to police censorship. It will be interesting to follow the effect of the picture shows on Germany's long-established drinking customs. In this country, saloons are hard hit by the motion picture theatres.—Trenton, N. J., Evening Times.

The Battle of Shiloh, one of the bitterest and most stubbornly contested engagements of the Civil War, has been refought for the Lubin cameras. The original battle ground and contiguous localities upon which General Grant and General Johnston and their heroic followers worked out one of the bloodiest chapters in the history of our country have been utilized for the enactment of this thrilling drama of love and war. The Battle of Shiloh is said to be the most artistic and authentic reproduction of a historic event ever made in Motion Pictures, and is illustrative of the astonishing progress the manufacturers of films have made. The Battle of Shiloh is in four reels and will be found on the General Film Company's Exclusive program.

Motion Picture Theatre Construction Department

A WELL-KNOWN architect, who has designed and erected a great number of theatres, says:

"While I am known to build theatres, and have always several in course of preparation, I do not consider myself a master, as after each theatre is completed, I see where I can improve on the next one."

The confession of this architect shows that the man designing and erecting cottages is not the right man to be consulted on a theatre.

There is another very important point. In every city of the United States the most drastic codes have been enacted on the construction of motion picture theatres, and unless the architect has had some former experience, it is hard for a builder of cottages to become familiar with all these building codes.

Concerning the Regent

Illustration No. 1 shows the Regent Theatre, at Seventh avenue and 116th street, New York, of which a complete description was given in the issue of July 26.

Since then the Regent has been entirely renovated and placed under the management of S. L. Rothapfel, known as the greatest genius in the art of fitting the music to the picture.

In illustration No. 2 is shown the exact position of the operating booth, under the balcony. The rear wall of said operating booth is shown on the left side of illustration No. 3, the magnificent foyer.

Flowers are seen a little everywhere. Why not? Are they not a courteous attention to the women? Flowers are cheerful and place the stamp of refinement wherever they are found, on the dining-table, in the parlor, in the boudoir, even in the limousine.

I wish most of our readers would study illustration No. 3 and take notice of this army of clean-cut attendants, how they wear the uniform, the true military style. No hands in the pockets, no dudish cuffs on the trousers, no coats open to show either a flashy necktie or a dirty shirt. Even the operators keep their white duck coats buttoned to the neck.

S. L. Rothapfel is the king manager. He has great ideals, and his ambition is to see the dollar motion picture theatre. But how can we induce the public to pay a high admission if we don't pay a strict attention to these small details? I should say important details, as they mean much to the success of a theatre, but to many managers they are small and of no real importance. An exhibitor told me: "All this is waste of money and time. We cannot pay the wages for clean, decent ushers. We must take what we can for the price. Then our patrons come to see the pictures and not to admire beautiful draperies, flowers or see if the attendants have clean shoes."

My answer to such an exhibitor is: "You are wrong," and the future will prove it.

The Globe in Buffalo

Illustrations No. 4 and No. 5 show the façade and the lobby of the Globe Theatre, of Buffalo, N. Y., owned by the Sherman Amusement Co., and managed by S. S. Webster.

The Globe Theatre is of modern construction, with eight hundred seats and several boxes. The lobby is finished in marble and tile, with the ceiling and the side walls painted in old ivory and gold. Three large double doors lead into the auditorium, the decorations of which are most beautiful. The ceiling is high and built on graceful arcs in panels of heavy decorative scroll-work, while frescoing and plastic relief ornaments combine to make the interior especially attractive. The operating booth is absolutely fireproof, its construction being entirely of concrete and steel. The operating booth is equipped with three machines.

Two immense exhaust fans with a capacity of more than 60,000 feet a minute will carry out the impure air, causing a perfect circulation of fresh air at an equal temperature under and over every seat and in every nook and corner of the theatre, thereby supplying a healthful oxygen-filled atmosphere, thus reaching the highest point of modern theatre sanitation requirements.

The eye-comfort system of indirect illumination is used. This makes it possible to light the auditorium while the pictures are being run.

I visited Milwaukee, Wis., where I have found the Saxe Bros., the owners of seven of the best theatres of Milwaukee. Their start was small. It was in the old Theatorium, still doing business, but under an entire new dress.

Saxe Brothers' Activities

This first success gave rise to the Orpheum, which in its early days was then considered the most refined theatre of the State. The Orpheum is no more, as the Saxes allowed the Orpheum to be torn down with other buildings to make room for a new department store.

1.—THE REGENT THEATRE

The third venture of the Saxe Bros. was the Princess, which proved a general revolution in the construction of motion picture theatres. It was one of the first theatres to do away with the cheap-looking, ginger-bread decorations, and to uplift motion pictures by presenting them in a real palace.

The Princess of Milwaukee has been the show-house, the model of new constructions, and has been heralded in all the papers, and exhibitors came from long distances to examine this new style of theatre. The interior has been remodeled to increase the seating capacity to something like 1,100 chairs, and to provide some side boxes for 10-cent seats.

In quick succession the Saxe Brothers opened the Alhambra, the Saxe, the Crystal, the Modjeska and the Juneau.

Are they going to stop? No, these gentlemen are too successful to stop, and they are now planning the erection of a large Hippodrome. They have bought property around the Princess Theatre, and it is their intention to move the Princess Theatre a few doors below to make room for the new Hippodrome.

Owe Success to Confidence

The question remains to know to what is due the success of the Saxe Brothers? My answer is that, like Max Stern, Mr. Sievers and other successful exhibitors, the Saxe Brothers did not adopt the circus policy of P. T. Barnum, but from the very first they had confidence in motion pictures, and devoted all their efforts to uplift the industry, to give a refined show and to encourage the patronage. There is no doubt that if the Saxe Brothers had followed the policy of the ignorant exhibitors by giving an inferior show, too long a program, a display of ugly and sensational posters, they could have, like others, coined some money at the start, but where would they be to-day?

Saxe Brothers went slowly. They appealed to the better element, and through their constant efforts Milwaukee has today a most select class of lovers of motion pictures. The policy of the Saxe Brothers was not to try to grab all the nickels in sight, but to educate the public, uplift motion pictures and assure them a bright future.

The Saxe Brothers are business men. They know how to spend money to make money; they know that cheap wage do not bring the results, and from the very start they have established a most remarkable organization.

The success of the Saxe theatres is due to a great organization. Frank Cook is the general manager over the six motion picture houses. He has under his supervision a local manager for each house, and the local manager is responsible for his force.

3.—THE FOYER AND ATTENDANTS, REGENT THEATRE

Machine Shop in Basement

As I have mentioned the name of P. T. Barnum, I must state that the Saxe Brothers copy the great showman by having everything under their control, and need to depend on no one in case of an emergency.

In the basement of the Alhambra Theatre is to be found a well-equipped machine shop. This is not a toy, but a very large, commodious shop, with private office and store-rooms, lathes, drills and other such heavy machinery, and tools of all descriptions. Experienced hands are busy repairing projecting machines, lamp-houses, rheostats, arc-lamps, electric signs and fixtures, etc.

The operators of the different Saxe theatres have no excuse for projecting a bad picture, as if there is anything wrong with the projection they send to the shop, and repairs are made without interruption to business. A large stock of machine-heads, magazines, lamphouses, rheostats and other parts are kept in stock in case of an emergency call.

One feature of the Alhambra Theatre is the care of children. At the rear of the auditorium is a large sunny room filled with toys of all descriptions and in charge of matrons. The mothers who wish to enjoy a good show, and who do not wish to annoy their neighbors with noisy and crying babies, leave them in the care of the matrons. There the children find everything to amuse themselves, from slides, rocking-horses, dolls, furniture, balls and animals, to a pit of sand with real sand, shovels and tin buckets.

Change Stage Settings

The Saxe Brothers have their orchestra on the stage and partly hidden behind some artistic scenery. The setting at the Alhambra represented a typical Japanese garden, with beautiful light effects of varied colors. When the picture is on the screen the lights are kept very low, just enough illumination to show the outlines of the scenery, yet not enough to spoil the projection.

These settings are not permanent. They are changed once in a while, as Howard Tuttle, who has his scenic studio behind the stage, and who is kept busy the year round making new stage settings for the Saxe theatres, is all the time experimenting with new effects. It is an art with Mr. Tuttle. I was amazed when I visited his studio and found so many sketches of new compositions. Illustration No. 7 shows the curtain painted by Mr. Tuttle for J. E. Williams, of the Grand Opera House, of Oshkosh, Wis.

It is claimed that S. L. Rothapfel was the first one to conceive the idea of placing his orchestra on the stage and of giving to both his picture and his musicians some artistic setting. Mr. Rothapfel has the right idea, as a picture shown on a plain wall, with practically no frame to it, looks too cold and too mechanical.

Mr. Rothapfel made the success of the Lyric, of Minneapolis, Minn. Later he resigned from the Lyric to go with the Shubert Brothers at their Lyric Theatre of Chicago.

From Chicago Mr. Rothapfel went with the Saxe Brothers, of Milwaukee, and there found a responsive chord. The Saxe Brothers, then the leading showmen of Milwaukee were only too pleased to welcome new ideas, and Mr. Rothapfel started to work with all his energy, and in the course of time he made of the Alhambra Theatre, of Milwaukee, the leading motion picture house for miles around. The excellent and appropriate music, the beautiful stage settings, the tasteful lobby decorations of the Saxe houses under Rothapfel's management gained fame, and although he left Milwaukee to come to show to New Yorkers what are real motion pictures de luxe, the Saxe houses of Milwaukee are still drawing the best patronage, as the spirit of the master is still there.

Conservatory on Stage

Illustration No. 7 shows a good specimen of what Mr. Rothapfel can do to give more life to the picture and to enhance its beauties.

The stage of the Regent Theatre represents a conservatory. The musicians play on the stage and are partly hidden by potted plants and other decorations, including an electric fountain. Two large windows open on either side, with appropriate backgrounds, giving a perspective to the scene.

The photograph, although perfect in details, does not convey the beautiful and pleasing sight of a night performance, when the changing lights of varied colors procure the most wonderful effects.

A heavy velvet curtain is lowered in front of the screen between the pictures when the singers appear at the windows or the orchestra plays a special selection.

It is art in every sense of the word, and there is no wonder that a manager paying so much attention to all the details is rewarded by a constantly increasing patronage.

The last illustration shows the New Amusu Theatre of Walter, Brown & Davis, of Elmira, N. Y., replacing the old one destroyed by fire on March 13, 1913.

As far as possible wood and inflammable materials have been eliminated. It is of tile-block, brick and cement walls, covered with fireproof roofing. The front is finished in stucco, and makes a handsome appearance. Everything in the interior of the building is attractive, being finished in a near manner of buff and deep yellow, finely blended.

6.—CURTAIN, GRAND OPERA HOUSE, OSHKOSH, WIS.

The lighting of the Amusu is of the most modern system, and the cooling system for the summer months is the most perfect.

When the representative of The Motion Picture News visited the Amusu, Manager Walter was making the necessary arrangements for the heating and ventilating of the theatre during the cold season. J. M. B.

AN illustration shows the Alhambra, of Toledo, the new house of W. C. Bettis.

Its interior is a regular palace, most luxurious with fine draperies and heavy carpets, even on the stairs. Everything is in keeping and has an atmosphere of refinement with its flowers and well-uniformed ushers. The uniform is of dark red cloth, trimmed with black braid for the coat, and white duck trousers.

The façade of stone is a monument to the city and in perfect harmony with the beautiful bank office building on the corner.

The front doors are old walnut with heavy French plate glass panels, covered with rich curtains on the inside. The casings and base of the ticket office are also walnut, with artistic stained glass above the doors and for the windows of the ticket booth.

An elegant marquise extends over the sidewalk the full length of the building. The ventilation is the very best. The air is cleaned, heated or cooled, according to the season, in a high cemented basement, pushed through small openings in the floor and pumped through the roof, forcing a constant change of air.

Another illustration shows the disposition of the doors at the Alhambra Theatre of Mr. Bettis:

This arrangement of two lobbies, one on each side of the ticket office, offers a protected entrance from bad weather to the incoming patrons and a protected exit for the outgoing visitors. These two lobbies act also as storm-doors.

It is very encouraging for any man with a strong desire to see motion pictures reach a higher plane and be the great universal educator, to see that not only the manufacturers of films are doing their best to improve the pictures, but that the architects are taking a deep interest in the matter, and are working to build theatres befitting the new pictures. In plain words, the architects all over the country are building elegant frames for the pictures.

THE ALHAMBRA, TOLEDO, OHIO

The improvements on theatres have been slow in the past because the whole attention of the film manufacturers, renters and exhibitors was on the film only. We have entered a new era and now that the managers realize the necessity to cater to a better patronage, we may expect some great things in the future.

SOLAX-BLACHE PLANT ENLARGED

A new building is being built at the already commodious plant of the Solax and Blache Company, the interests of which are allied, at Fort Lee, N. J. The foundation is now being laid for the new building, which will be fifty by one hundred feet in size, two stories high, and built of stone and concrete. It will be joined to the present plant, which is one hundred by one hundred and fifty feet in size, by a steel bridge. The factory, laboratory and dark-rooms will be moved into the new building, and the space thus acquired in the old building will be used for additional office, studio and shipping-room.

The allied companies will give a Solax and Blache feature service in five centers. One is from Buffalo, covering New York State, exclusive of Greater New York. The second is Indianapolis, from which Indiana and Kentucky will be handled. From St. Louis, Missouri and Southern Illinois will be handled. The fourth is Kansas City, covering Kansas, Arkansas, Colorado and Northern Oklahoma, and the fifth, in Atlanta, will cover Tennessee, North and South Carolina, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi and Louisiana.

The following features are now being booked: "The Rogues of Paris," four reels; "Star of India," four reels; "A Prisoner in the Harem," four reels and "A Fight for Millions."

The Solax and Blache companies together release two features a month. Soon they plan also to buy outside makes.

EXCLUSIVE FEATURES CONTRACT WITH ITALA

Harry A. Samwick, of the Exclusive Features, Inc., has arragned with Nector J. Streyckmans, of the Itala Film Company, for the New York state rights on all Itala subjects, beginning with "Gypsy's Kiss." The Exclusive Features also control New York state rights on all the feature subjects of the Film Releases of America.

J. M. Goldstein, president of the Exclusive Features, has signed a lease for large offices in the Masonic Building at Twenty-third street and Sixth avenue, the same to be occupied about January 1. The present offices at 24 East Twenty-first street have been found inadequate to carry on the business increased since they began releasing three features weekly.

U. S. USES POWER'S

The U. S. Government is using more than fifty Power's Cameragraph No. 6A Projection Machines on battleships, at West Point and at army posts for instructions in military and naval tactics, as well as for the entertainment of the enlisted men.

BERT ENNIS AND MISS PIRUNG WED

Miss Clara Muriel Pirung, of Flatbush, and Bert G. Ennis, publicity and advertising manager of the Eclair Company, were married Thanksgiving Eve at the church of St. Rose of Lima, Washington avenue, Flatbush. Mr. and Mrs. Ennis are now on a short trip South.

MRS. BERT G. ENNIS

Thus culminates a romance which began in the spring of 1910, when Miss Pirung and several others histrionically inclined formed the Kensington Players Club. Miss Pirung was playing the leading female part, and Mr. Ennis, then in vaudeville, produced the play.

Miss Pirung is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. John C. Pirung, of 408 East Seventeenth street, Brooklyn. Mr. Ennis is a son of Mr. and Mrs. R. J. Ennis, of 415 Westminster Road, Brooklyn, and a grandson of the late Henry F. Hughes, a pioneer piano manufacturer. The ceremony was conducted by the Rev. Father Leo Ennis, a cousin of the groom. George Bunny, son of John Bunny, the Vitagraph star, took motion pictures of the bride and groom entering and leaving the church, and of the festivities following the ceremony. The young couple will make their home in the Ditmas Court apartments, Flatbush, New York.

SUPREME FEATURE SELLING

The Supreme Feature Film Comany, Inc., formerly located at 64 East Fourteenth street, and now located at 145 West Forty-fifth street, are now selling state rights on its big six-reel production "The Hero of a Nation, Bar-Cochba," which took them five months to make; and was acted by the most prominent European talent.

OH, IT'S AN INTERESTING LIFE!

Punctuated by GEORGE D. PROCTOR

MEMORIES of the house-warming of the new home of the Screen Club at 165 West Forty-seventh street, are the first thoughts that steal over me as I warm up the right arm over the keys. I think memories of that occasion will continue to haunt me for some time, for it was considerbul of an affair.

It's a wonderful organization, this Screen Club. The house-warming of last week was only the official entrance into its present, expanded sphere. When a college student is handed his sheepskin and told to go out and wrestle for a living the occasion is called "Commencement Day," although it is the end of his college course. So when the Screen Club graduated from its quarters in Forty-fifth street, and they were dear to us all, that graduation was only the commencement.

It was only about fourteen months ago that the charter was granted the Screen Club. Look at it now. It occupies a beautifully furnished home in the heart of New York's motion-picture and theatrical district. From a small beginning it has grown quickly but with a solid growth, till now it has among its members a good majority of the actors, together with many of the manufacturers, and a liberal sprinkling of press agents, writers, and so on.

The spirit of the Screen Club is not lightly to be considered, either. The boys all stick to each other through thick and thin. A chance to boost is never let pass unheeded. The noon-day lunch sessions are the most valuable film forum of the day. Anyone burdened with conceit is sure to lose it in passing.

But about the house-warming. More than eight hundred persons visited the Screen Club between six at night and the wee small hours. The house was literally packed. It was a human sardine can. And everybody was tickled to death with what he saw. Auspicious is an old word and a favorite of Noah's, but that is what the opening was. The house was packed for hours. Celebrities of the screen and stage elbowed each other. There were good things to eat and the white-aproned knights were busy. The Edison Kinetophone Quartet sang ad libitum and in the large dining-room of the Hotel Longacre, which was utilized as an overflow hall. Everybody was happy and everybody was pleased. It was a memorable occasion.

And early in the morning, as the little birds perched by request on the window-sill, three men were saying good-bye in voices as tender as Marathon runners at the end of the hundredth mile. They were King Baggot, president; Joseph White Farnham, first vice-president, and J. H. H. Gerhardt, treasurer, to whom more than any others, is due the credit for the success of the housewarming.

Who was there, did you ask? Oh, what's the use of promoting petty jealousies. Read the who's who of th film game. They all were there. ALL—and then some.

John Hardin, for nine years handling Edison films, walked into the Ambrosio offices this week and took his seat as sales manager. Thus does John enter on a new career and one with broad vistas of success ahead. He will surely start by adding to the buyers several of his many personal friends and others will follow. John Hardin with Ambrosio. And he gets his pitcher in the papers.

Taking a crack at censors in general and the Ohio board in particular is one of the principal indoor sports of the day. I must admit that I feel a thrill when someone says "Any censorship is un-American." But as long as it is a very present thing it can not be vociferated into the background.

Granting merely for the sake of argument that there must be censors, it is easy to see that the more censor boards there are, the more trouble is in store for all in the film business, as they seem anxious not to work together.

President Neff's own hand-raised censors out in Ohio are having their troubles writing letters to the newspapers and a Federal injunction has been slapped on them. The other states can sit back and observe. Meanwhile the Ohio film men are in a pretty pickle. If there must be censors why not an authorized national body and one composed of persons who will see the questionable films made by mushroom producers as well as the program stuff and who are broad-minded and sensible. But all this is Utopian.

Heading the list of the pleasant festivities after the Screen Club ball comes the little gathering Sunday night at the home of Charles Feature Abrams, whose name has been heard before. For film men there were present J. W. Farnham, Joe Miles, Charles Kessel, Fred Balshofer, and John Mahan.

Then the faithful few journeyed way up-town to the ball of the "Bronx Movie Circle" an organization of motion picture operators and pianists inhabiting the top of the city as the map hangs on the wall. A lot of film folk were present including Kinemacolor and Universal delegations. Maurice Costello and Florence Lawrence led the grand march followed by Irving Cummings and partner and Darwin Karr and Claire Whitney. It was a merry affair and how late it lasted is a matter of guesswork. The officers of the organization are: President, Morris Sillish; vice-president, Otto Spitz; secretary and treasurer, Abraham J. Kessler; secretary, David S. Herbertt and sergeant-at-arms, Phil Peller. Around the hall were the arrangement committee: Charles Gates, chairman; Abraham Kessler, Phil Peller, David S. Herbertt and Morris Sillish and the floor committee: Frank Percher, floor manager; Charles Ritchie, assistant floor manager; Arnold Tyroller, chairman; George J. Sokoloff and Irving Perry.

Echoes coming in from Minnesota indicate that the battle there between Otto N. Rath and M. A. Neff is a hot one. Rath and his followers will meet in Morris and organize on December 12. The organization is called the Motion Picture Association of Minnesota and its motto is "Minnesota for Minnesotans." President Neff seems somewhat peeved and has issued a statement saying that he is glad that Rath and his followers have quit the league. So there you are.

Which reminds me that Neff will hold a convention to re-organize Wisconsin at the Atheran Hotel on December 16 and 17. George M. Westley is now busy getting new members in Wisconsin.

Signor Joseph Hopp of Chicago and points East is going to be quite the busy boy. Since selling out his Standard Film Exchange to the Universal he has revivified his Union Film Company, moved into larger quarters and plans to supply a feature a day, which is something of an undertaking, ask any feature buyer. Joe made a flying trip to New York last week.

He may also accept the presidency of the newly formed Laclede company. This company is producing three-reel Westerns, the first of which is "The Pale-Face Squaw" already on the market. The product is being marketed through the Films Lloyds which means Charlie Abrams. The home of the concern is in St. Louis.

Incidentally Joe reports that his brother William Hopp is recovering after his recent operation.

Phil Klein, treasurer of the All Star Feature Corporation, was due back Friday from England where he has been busy for several weeks. Sans doute he has a bundle of contracts with English stars and authors.

Eberhard Schneider is much put out over the statement of A. E. Smith, of the Vitagraph Company of America, on the stand in the Patents Company suit to the effect that he invented the "framing device" now used on projection machines. Schneider, in an official statement, says he invented it and cites dates and patent numbers.

The suit against the Patents Company marked time over the holiday and will resume again December 1, according to schedule.

Mayor Kline, Mayor-elect Mitchel, several judges, and other notables are expected to be among the laity present at the ball of the Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Greater New York at Terrace Garden on December 15.

Ramo films are back in the ring with a strong advertising campaign with C. Lang Cobb, Jr., manager of sales and publicity of that company at the head. This company is producing two strong, dramatic, three-reel features a month. It is sparing no pains to produce the best.

Fred Beecroft please note.

Meanwhile Agnes Egan Cobb is quite the busy lady at her desk at 225 West Forty-second street. She had three Union Features a month to handle, on the tenth, twentieth and thirtieth, and two Features Ideal which are released on the fifth and twenty-fifth, a total of five for one lone woman. Not only that but she sells 'em and gets up all the heralds, lithos, publicity matter and so on. Figure it out for yourself whether she's good or not. Her first of the Features Ideal is "The Guerrillas of Algiers" or "The Mosque in the Desert." More about this picture later.

Mary Pickford, Little Mary, is on her way to Los Angeles where the Famous Players have opened a studio. Edwin S. Porter will be the producer there.

George Kleine's new theater in Forty-second street, New York City, between Seventh and Eighth avenues, is progressing rapidly and the contractors now say it will open about the middle of March. This is the first theater in America especially erected for plural-reel features It will be equipped with every device to make the presentation of the pictures perfect. The name has not yet been decided upon.

The Society of Allied Arts, of which J. Stuart Blackton, Vice-president of the Vitagraph Company of America, is a member, visited the Vitagraph studios last Saturday.

Marshall P. Wilder, who has made kings laugh, and who must be remembered for his work in many Vitagraph comedies, is thirsting to appear on the screen again. He confided as much to me at the Screen Club housewarming. He may be reached at the Lambs Club or Atlantic City.

G. W. Landon, who for the past several years has specialized in advertising along motion picture projection lines, has joined the staff of the Precision Machine Company, and will handle the publicity and advertising of the Simplex projector.

Many reports of progress emanate from the Mutual offices. The indoor studio at 29 Union Square West, where Larry Griffith will work, is about ready. Three entire floors will be used.

Daniel Carson Goodman, author of the "Hagar Revelly" which drew the fire of Anthony Comstock, has been engaged to censor all productions before they are released. Miss Katherine Eggleston, a magazine and newspaper writer, has been engaged to edit and title films at the Reliance studio.

DON'T YAWN, BOYS

Hector Streychmans has an automobile for sale.

John W. Gray is handling the Universal's national advertising campaign.

Many exhibitors will give away "Alkali Ike" dolls for Christmas presents.

Wilfrid North, director, is back with the Vitagraph Company after the accident whereby particles of powder were shot in his eyes.

C. B. (Pop) Hoadley has gone with the Biograph on the scenario desk.

J. W. Anderson, brother of "Broncho Billy," is now playing in pictures at the Western Essanay studio.

The Imp picture, "Traffic in Souls," is showing on Broadway at the Joe Weber playhouse.

Horace Bennet has been engaged as manager of the branch office of the World Special Films Corporation at New Orleans. William H. Irvine has been engaged for the Washington, D. C., branch. This concern has added a poster department, located at 213 West Fortieth street.

The Manhattan Feature Film Company has bought upper New York state on several Ramo features. Edgar C. Briggs is manager of sales and booking. Frank Donovan is manager and publicity expert.

C. J. Giegerich, late of the defunct Scientific Cinematography, is now with the Leslie syndicate.

Teddy Salomon, who has been the operator in the Universal projection room for some time, goes to the Imp studio as editor and titler.

Jack Cohen doesn't leave the Universal after all. In fact he moves up to the position of editor of the Animated Weekly.

Mailing cards extolling the Simplex machines are going the rounds.

Mary Fuller, of Edison, won the popularity contest conducted by the Colonial Theatre, Buffalo.

Yale Boss, Edison actor, has graduated into long trousers.

P. G. Lynch, formerly of the Pacific Mutual Film Corporation, has been engaged by S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Company, as his assistant at Santa Barbara, Cal. Mr. Lynch will be in charge of business matters at the new Santa Barbara studios.

Kathlyn Williams' new play, projected and completed under her own direction, is called "The Leopard's Foundling," and is a new note in dramatic daring in dealing with the carnivora as though the treacherous big cats were the most tractable and gentle of animals. Miss Williams herself plays the leading part.

Phil Gleichman, of the World Special Films Corporation, has just returned from a trip down South.

Jane Fisher, of the Ramo Stock Company, was operated on last week and is still in a precarious condition.

Donald MacDonald, for two years a leading man with the Universal, is now a director. He also spent a year with the Selig forces.

The two-reel picture, "How the Jews Care for Their Poor," made by the Universal, will be shown Sunday night at the annual banquet of the Brooklyn Federation of Jewish Charities.

The Canadian offices of Warner's Features are now permanently settled at 360 St. Catherine street, West, Montreal. F. A. Fenton is in charge, assisted by Mr. Holland.

H. M. Russell, of the Pan-American Film Company, has just returned from a flying trip to Salt Lake City and Los Angeles.

Miss Pauline Widrow, the capable little "Demi Tasse" of the Italian-American Film Corporation, is, these days, very much pleased with the work she is ticking out on her machine.

TWO OLD FAVORITES FILMED

"Ten Nights in a Barroom," Owned by Photo Drama Company—"The Stranglers of Paris," Produced by Motion Drama Company

"TEN Nights in a Barroom," which has been a pet subject for temperance workers for years, has at last reached the motion picture screen. It has been produced as a five-part motion picture owned by the Photo Drama Company.

THE STRAW RIDE IN "TEN NIGHTS IN A BARROOM"

This production, made under the direction of Lee Beggs, brings to the mind the horrors of drink more vividly than could any play or lecturer. When Joe Morgan goes into delirium tremens a snake of horrendous size crawls across the table before his eyes and entwines itself around him, then vanishes utterly and instantly.

This is perhaps the most impressive scene in the picture, as it drives in the effects of drink on the brain of the spectator, but there are many other things worth while to be seen. There are pastoral scenes where one can almost smell the new-mown hay. There are drunken brawls where strong men and a child are struck down and there is the transformation of Joe Morgan from a prosperous mill owner to a sot, through drink, and his subsequent regeneration. This, of course, is the big lesson of the film.

An Exceptional Cast

As for the cast, Robert Vaughn plays Joe Morgan, Violet Horner is his wife, Robert Lawrence plays Simon Slade, a saloonkeeper, Marie Traldo is his wife, and Jack Regan plays the Judge's son.

First is shown the rural courtship of the Morgans and the Lawrences and the wedding of the Morgans, together with a barn dance. Later Joe starts on the drunkard's path. His dainty wife has to come after him in Slade's bar. He keeps on down and down, is ousted from his house and his position as half-owner of the mill. In fact, he loses his all through drink. A gambler comes to town and gets the son of Judge Hammond in a game.

At this point the contrast in the homes of the seller of drinks and the consumer is made clear. Joe is down and out. He and his wife are in abject poverty, while the Slades are prosperous. Joe wanders down to the river. There he saves the life of the Judge's son when the latter's horse runs away on a ricketty bridge and throws him in the water. Joe's little girl comes after him in the saloon. There is a fight. Slade hits out with a beer bottle and hits the little girl. She is taken home and dies. Joe, in horrible delirium tremens, sees snakes. Slade is tried, but his friends on the jury acquit him. Joe swears never to touch another drop of liquor.

Then his regeneration begins. He is taken back into the firm. Incited by him, the villagers attack Slade's tavern, wreck it, and spill the liquor on the ground. Years later Joe is found, happy in his home and friends, a new man.

WHEN David Belasco produced "The Stranglers of Paris" on the legitimate stage it was the sensation of the day. It was a dramatization of Belot's famous novel, popularly regarded as a sensational and vivid narrative embodying conditions in Paris nearly a decade ago.

Now this play also has reached the screen in six reels as the first production of the Motion Drama Company. It is a play especially well adapted for motion picture production. It contains many thrilling incidents, all of which are reproduced vividly, with due regard to working up the dramatic values, yet the details are not overlooked. For instance, a clever little comedy bit is introduced when a Frenchman doffs his hat in a jerky manner. Little things like that do much to make or break a film. This production surely will "make."

Gordon's Double Duty

To James Gordon is due much of the credit. He directed the picture and played the leading part, that of Jagon. His enormous physique and his powerful face render him exceedingly well fitted by nature for this part, and he makes the most of his endowments. He makes the strange character a living reality. Anna Hull plays Jeanette, his daughter, with her usual savoir faire.

HANDS OF FATE, "THE STRANGLERS OF PARIS"

Dramatic scenes follow each other with almost bewildering rapidity. Lusty fights are frequent. Then a man leaps from a vessel into the open sea. Scenes in an underworld café are interesting. High society, too, has its innings. Light comedy touches are interspersed. The lover of any especial factor in what goes to make a successful picture will find what he likes in this. The story, briefly, follows.

In a little rose-covered cottage in a village of France lived Simmonet, a respectable citizen, his wife and their little daughter, Mathilde.

Their happiness was complete but short-lived, as his wife died after a short illness. Simmonet, nearly insane with grief, takes to drink, neglects his business, and sinks to the depths of an outcast of society. He is aroused to a sense of his condition, but fails to regain a foothold—it is too late. He becomes vindictive, hates all mankind, and makes a vow that, by no matter what means, he would save his child from the pangs of poverty.

He takes his child to Paris, where she grows to womanhood, ignorant of her father's double life. Simmonet loses his identity and assumes the name of Jagon. He soon drifts into the underworld of Paris, and, owing to his superior strength and powerful personality, becomes the leader of the dreaded gang known as "The Stranglers of Paris."

Attracted by Her Beauty

A wealthy, elderly gentleman, Claude Guerin, is attracted by Mathilde's beauty, and asks her hand in marriage. Jagon makes a tool of Mathilde and compels her to accept, provided he makes a will in her favor. This he does and is strangled by Jagon and found dead before the wedding day. For this crime, Blanchard, an innocent man, is convicted on circumstantial evidence.

Later, Captain Guerin, a brother of the murdered man, contests the will and obtains a verdict in favor of his daughter Jeanne. The day the money is paid to him by the court he is followed to his home by Jagon and his accomplice, Lorenz. That night Captain Guerin is strangled by Jagon and the money stolen.

About this time Blanchard had been made a "trusty" of the prison, and succeeded on the night of the murder to slip away for a few hours to visit his wife, who is a maid at Captain Guerin's home. He was seen to enter and leave the house by several persons. He was brought back and, owing to his record, is held for the crime. Jagon, too self-confident, enters the room at this moment and is recognized by Jeanne as the man who had called on her father prior to his death, and accuses him. He is arrested and convicted of the crime and sentenced with Blanchard as his accomplice to penal servitude for life. Fearing this, Jagon had previously given Lorenz the money and the family papers of Don Jose the Marquis de Ribas and instructed him to assume this name, and to take care of his daughter Mathilde. This Lorenz does, and later marries her.

Jeanne Guerin, believing that Blanchard, the husband of her maid, is innocent of the crime of her father's death, entreats her lover, Robert, an officer in the army, to secure the proofs of his innocence. He meets Mathilde, who becomes infatuated with him, and promises to assist him, and when shown photographs of Jagon and Blanchard, discovers that Jagon is her father. In a scene with Lorenz, who is jealous of Robert, she declares him the real accomplice of her father and asserts that she will rescue this innocent man and denounce him. Lorenz, fearful of this threat, strangles her.

Innocent Man Cleared

At this very moment Jagon appears, he and Blanchard having escaped from the convict ship. He springs upon Lorenz and almost strangles him, when he is shot by Lorenz and falls by his daughter's side. Arousing himself to follow Lorenz and kill him, he disappears behind curtains. Lorenz wanders back half-dazed, and nearing the curtains is drawn back of them by the powerful grip of Jagon, the strangler, and later found dead.

Jagon, semi-conscious from loss of blood, staggers into the arms of his daughter, who has recovered.

"Ten Nights in a Barroom"

He dies in her arms, but not until he has cleared Blanchard of both crimes, and sees him united to his wife, a "free man."

A NEW branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York was formed in the Williamsburg section of Brooklyn on Thursday night, November 20.

The meeting was held at the progress Theatre, 116 Graham avenue, with thirty-two exhibitors in attendance from the direct local district. It was called to order at 11:45 p. m. by Samuel H. Trigger, president, who discussed the feasibility of forming local branches throughout Greater New York.

Music and the Picture

Suggestions Invited, Questions Cheerfully Answered

Address: Music Department, The Motion Picture News

THE beautiful presentation of the Kleine version of "Last Days of Pompeii" at the Regent Theatre, New York City, under the leadership of Manager S. L. Rothapfel, confirms what I have said in these pages, viz., a full orchestra and a pipe-organ can furnish the most appropriate music and enhance the beauty of the picture, provided the leader or the organist arrange their music to suit the different scenes.

As the work of selecting the different themes is beyond the comprehension of some managers and musicians, I still stick to my policy and advise the manager who cannot afford the wages of high-talented musicians to keep a single piano. A good pianist able to play the picture will bring better results than an orchestra playing a rag-time tune during a death-bed scene.

Music as an Added Attraction

The following lines are contributed by an exhibitor who knows how to use the great musical instrument of Mr. Hope-Jones, of the Wurlitzer fame:

"Did it ever occur to you that some people may come to your theatre in spite of poor music?

"And, by the same token, some may actually stay away because of poor music?

"If you actually lose 10 per cent. of possible patronage by poor music, how much more do you lose by not having music that is really an added attraction and will bring you additional patronage on its own account?

"Who wants to see a funeral procession to the accompaniment of a rag-time piano and a drum? Also, 'Way Down on the Suwanee River,' sounds like the mischief for a melodramatic scene climax. Also the organ and voice effect is needed for a wedding scene.

"Finally, the right atmosphere for every picture is absolutely necessary for its greatest success, and the right music is the one essential thing to produce the right atmosphere.

"If you can't afford a large, well-balanced orchestra, get an instrument that can be played by one man that will give you the effects you want.

"About a year ago the spectacular play, 'A Daughter of Heaven,' was given in the Century Theatre, in New York, with an instrument built according to scientific principles discovered and given to the world by an English genius. The Wurlitzer Unit Orchestra had previously already been used in leading theatres and auditoriums, and the world of critics and musicians regard it highly. Instruments specially adapted for the motion picture theatres have been developed on these principles, and the charming and wonderful effects are astonishing. The 'Quo Vadis' and the 'Les Miserables' films in the Astor Theatre, in New York, and in other cities have been great successes with these instruments.

Cost Is Moderate

"The special advantage of the instrument is, of course, the fact that the effects can be obtained at such a mederate cost—effects otherwise obtainable only through comparatively large orchestras with a great variety of instruments and traps.

"The good effect of good music on the attitude of the audience towards the whole performance has been noted by the writer in many cities with many classes of audiences.

"Good music, whether by a high-grade orchestra or a fine instrument, quiets a restless audience and gives the cheerful atmosphere that makes them want to come back."

Musical instrument manufacturers are realizing that motion pictures are here to stay, and as they become more and more popular, they are all trying to get a share of the business by devising new instruments to give more life to the picture. I have described the Dramagraph, Deagan Bells, Excelsion Sound Effect Cabinet, Bartola, Leedy Chimes, etc., and in the following issues I will try to keep the reader posted on anything in this line. Appearance and Manners

Suggestions Invited, Questions Cheerfully Answered

Address: Exhibitors' Department, The Motion Picture News

IN a previous issue of The Motion Picture News, I said that while good manners could be taught to a certain degree, the recipient of such an education does not always make an efficient employee, as his true character will show one day or another.

Good manners must be born with the man, otherwise he looks, under his new varnish, like the young farmer who puts on a Sunday suit to come to town to show himself. Everyone can see that the farmer boy, used to free movements in loose clothes, is ill at ease in the city clothes. The same applies to the man who has no manners, who has not been trained from his youth to look clean, neat, and to be polite with every one. He will, for the sake of keeping his job, do his best to listen to good advice and try to correct himself, but one day or another his rough early training will crop out.

Promotion Often a Reward

Managers cannot be too careful in the selection of their attendants as clean, neat, polite and courteous men mean much to the success of the place.

As already stated, I had the pleasure to meet several of these clean-cut attendants. They are steady workers. From year to year you find them at the same theatre, not always at the same job, because we have some conscientious managers, who can appreciate good work and promote their employees.

A COSY CORNER

I was rather surprised to see the good business done at the Morse Theatre, of Chicago, because I had no idea that Rogers Park, of Chicago, had enough population to maintain regular motion-picture theatres.

In my opinion, it was more or less of a risky game, and while some managers would fail in this district, Charles E. Bowles is making a grand success.

The affable manner of Mr. Bowles, his even character, no matter what may be the troubles resting on his shoulders, make him a real favorite. He is always the same perfect gentleman, at his theatre, at his business office in the loop district or on the street. Same pleasing greeting, same kind smile, never too busy to answer. If he is too busy to receive you, he does not throw you out with a gruff word: "I am too busy," but with a courteous answer he gives you to understand that your visit will be appreciated at another time and you depart satisfied and ready to call again.

Mr. Bowles acts as his principal usher. He likes to greet his patrons, show them the best seats at his disposition, and he endears himself so much to them that most of the patrons return nightly, not so much to see the pictures as to meet the genial manager. Then, as the patrons talk to their neighbors, the Morse is the rendezvous for the best patronage; many of them come from quite a long distance.

Indifference Out of Date

It is useless to say that the cashier, doorman and the other ushers act likewise, as they have a good example to follow, and they can see for themselves that a neat, clean appearance and good manners make the success of a motion picture theatre.

The influence of Charles E. Bowles is such that he could manage his theatre without the help of posters, as no old or questionable pictures can be shown in a house so well managed, where everything is of the highest quality and efficiency.

As I have stated, appearance is not a vain word, but is taken up not only by our big corporations, but even by the small business men, who realize that business cannot be conducted to-day on the style of indifference.

Last Wednesday I was surprised to see a sandwich man enter the steam-cars at a station between Toledo and Buffalo, dressed in snow-white. White spotless duck and trousers, white apron and cap. He had no trouble to dispose of his sandwiches, as his clean, neat appearance was a guarantee that his eatables had been prepared with the greatest care.

We must not lose sight of the fact that many persons go to motion picture shows not so much to see the pictures as to rest themselves. I may surprise several managers in telling them that thousands of business men, salesmen and others on the road, spend a nickel or a dime to visit a motion picture show while waiting for their train. In the old times such road men had to kill time by visiting the saloons.

We have also to consider the number of women who, after running for bargains, feel the necessity of a rest, and the motion picture theatre is just the place, as it rests mind as well as body. When these facts are taken into consideration, we realize that such persons are more or less influenced by the outside clean and neat appearance of a theatre.

If I devote so much attention on this question of appearance and manners, it is to encourage the managers to keep up with the times and to not overlook the general public sentiment.

It may be that most of our managers are not aware that societies are forming all over the country to encourage courtesy.

In the past I have mentioned the rules of courtesy of the Pennsylvania Railroad, of the United Cigar Stores, etc., and now comes the following in a Cleveland daily:

COURTESY WINS PROMOTION FOR MAN "TAL" LAUDS

Polite Store Clerk Profits When Pleased Customer Writes His Employer

Organized courtesy has begun paying dividends.

Frank Harrison Miller, now floor manager at Higbee Co., is the first beneficiary.

Miller was a clerk in the silk department a month ago when the appreciation league was organized, its sole object being to reward cheerfulness, sympathy, courtesy, attention and helpfulness.

The "Tals," as the members call themselves, wasted little time after William V. Backus, 945 Engineers' Building, the founder of the cult, had perfected his plans.

And so it happened that two weeks ago Dr. Pauline Barton-Peeke, a "Tal," noticed the courtesy and cheerfulness of Miller as he waited on her at the silk counter. Back at her home she wrote the Higbee Co. a letter on Tal stationery, mentioning her courteous treatment.

Two days later Miller was made floor manager, with a suitable increase in salary. The letter was shown to Miller after the promotion was made.

"I didn't know her at the time," said Miller Wednesday. "She bought several pieces of silk, and I was glad I could please her. That was the last I thought about it until the office told me about her after they had promoted me.

"I had never thought of the financial end of courtesy before, but I've tried to be courteous because it gives one a better feeling toward himself."

"The movement which has just benefited Miller is bound to help all employees that are deserving," said Asa Shiverick, vice-president of Higbee's. "It is also going to create a new spirit in customers—one of helpfulness and not of criticism."

This should be a warning that such societies are forming all over the country, and motion picture men must make the necessary reforms if they wish the encouragement of the "Tals," as they call themselves. Do not allow the Tals to cast a bad note against your attendants.

To Film Army-Navy Game

EXCLUSIVE rights to take motion pictures of the football game between West Point and Annapolis, played at the Polo Grounds on Saturday, November 29, have been granted to the Commercial Motion Picture Company, of which Edward M. Roskam is the active head. This is the first time that motion picture camera operators have been allowed on the side lines during an Army-Navy game. Four camera men will be stationed around the field.

In addition to the game itself, there is considerable interest attached to the spectators. President Woodrow Wilson has a box on the Army side and Francis Sayre and the White House bride are expected to attend. Other notables holding boxes include General Miles, General Leonard Wood, Vice-President Marshall, Secretary of War Garrison, William Jennings Bryan, Attorney-General McReynolds, Secretary of State McAdoo, Governor Glynn, Senator Root, Senator Lodge, Senator O'Gorman, Mayor Kline, Senator Brandagee, Senator Ollie James, Champ Clark and Henry L. Stimson.

In addition to the state rights buyerrs the Commercial Motion Picture Company has a prospective customer for this picture in every army post and battleship.

INTERESTING FILM REVIEWS

Educational—Industrial—Scenic—General

"FOR the Love of a Toreador." (Cines. Nov. 18. Two Parts.)—There are many splendid scenes in this drama. The arena scenes, taken in Seville, Spain, are especially fine. A notable release. Francisco, a toreador, loves Lolita, a pretty Spanish girl. Carmen loves the fighter and is jealous of the favored Lolita. Just previous to the fight Francisco vows he will kill the largest animal in Lolita's favor and the news reaches Carmen through a matador. On the great day Francisco returns the victor, having fulfilled his promise, but just as the congratulations are being tendered him he is stabbed by the jealous Carmen. He recovers, and after he and Lolita are married Carmen begs forgiveness.

"Why I Am Here." (Vitagraph. Nov. 19.)—Probably the best comedy of the month; written by James Oliver Curwood. It is the story of a man who gets thirty days for beating up another. He tells his tale. He tells of kissing a flirt, of her threat to tell her beau, Bill Murphy, and of his fear for the latter gentleman, believing him to be a bully. Finally, after dodging him for weeks, he meets Murphy, a little puny, effeminate man, and promptly proceeds to "do him up." Sidney Drew played the "villain." Anita Stewart, as the girl, was perfect. Her work added much to the picture.

"A Lemon Plantation." (Melies. Nov. 20.)—Taken in Santa Paula, Cal., showing the various processes lemons pass through before becoming public property. There is much space given to details. Photography is very good.

"The Express-Car Mystery." (Kalem. Nov. 19. Two Parts.)—A melodramatic railroad story, which has some good features. Pasquale, a wandering violinist, is insulted by Dugan, a bully. On trying to retaliate, his violin is broken. John Grant, an express messenger, is entrusted with a large sum of money. This is stolen by Dugan in a thrilling manner, and John is blamed for the deed and put through a "third degree" in an effort to make him confess. Pasquale, in the interim, seeing the prosperity of Dugan, follows him in an attempt to regain money from him to pay for his broken violin. Missing him on the passenger train, the Italian holds up the engine of another train and follows the crook, finally catching him and having him arrested. John recognizes him and the truth is told.

"Farming in the Ancient City of Thebes." (Vitagraph. Nov. 19.)—Split reel with "Why I Am Here." Shows grain harvesting, treading the grain, and bullocks pumping water. Photography good.

"The Touch of a Child." (Selig Nov. 19.)—A good story, which cannot, however, be used as a suffrage advertisement. Tredgold, an impresario, asks Helen to join the opera. Her husband refuses her permission, but she goes anyway, breaking off with him, thus choosing between home and fame. She is a great success, and receives much attention from a Count. She repulses him and wishes to be back home. She receives word that her baby is very ill and needs her, and hurries back to her home. The little child unites the two and she forsakes the stage.

"By Impulse." (Patheplay. Nov. 19.)—Clever acting and good photography are the best points in this film. Harmon returns home after some absence and meets his old friend. A picture of the friend's daughter appeals to him. That evening the girl, Lucille, discharges a servant and goes to the employment bureau for another. While there she answers the 'phone and receives an application. Dressed as a servant she applies for a position with Harmon and is accepted. They rapidly become friends. A burglar calls and she "knocks him out" with a poker. Harmon and Lucille then get married and he learns her identity. Henry King plays "Harmon" and "Lucille" is played by Miss M. L. Pardee.

"The Detective's Stratagem." (Biograph. Nov. 20.)—This is a fair detective story. A cashier in a bank needs money very badly and succumbs to temptation. He goes to the bank in the evening to steal, but is caught by the watchman. As they are fighting, four burglars enter and loot the bank. A detective is called in and, by posing as a burglar, gets in with the robbers, and has them arrested when they are about to rob another bank. Just why the cashier is exonerated and why he was submitted to a "third degree" is not entirely clear.

"Conscience." (Broncho. Two Parts.)—This is an exceptionally good story, presenting some good situations. Haggerty, a crook, is forced to leave for the West in the disguise of a minister. He arrives there and is taken for one, and all goes well. He writes his pal, Bill, to come and join him, as there is plenty of chance to rob safes there. Bill comes, but in the meantime Haggerty has met a girl and has really reformed. Bill and he have a fight, in which Bill gets the better and is shot by the sheriff. Haggerty then writes to the girl and takes leave for ever. The finale is pretty and effective.

"The Soul of the South." (Kay Bee. Two Reels.)—Rather a good story, greatly augmented by clever acting and good settings. The first reel deals with ante-bellum moonshiners. The revenue officers raid them and some are killed. The little boy becomes an orphan and wanders away. He is adopted by a Southern gentleman, after his rescue of her daughter. The war breaks out and Jim is court-martialed and sentenced for falling asleep on duty. Betty, the girl, produces an old signature that Jefferson Davis had given her many years before and forges it to a pardon, taking it to the Colonel herself. Davis is visiting the Colonel and recognizes the girl. He verifies the pardon and sets the boy free.

"The Filly." (Domino. Two Reels.)—Richard Stanton's Irish impersonations are most clever. He plays with Anna Little in this picture and gives it a good Irish atmosphere.

Satan, a racing filly, is the only one that can beat the Squire's other horse. The Squire's daughter, Dolly, is the only one who can ride her. Dan and Dolly are in love with one another to the father's chagrin. Satan "goes lame" just before the race, and Dan paints her brown, putting her in the race with Dolly as jockey. She, of course, wins, and the purse is large enough to allow them to be married.

"Love vs. Law." Imp. Two Reels.)—Charles Eldridge, formerly with the Vitagraph Company, plays a splendid part in this comedy. King Baggot and Ethel Grandin are also good. The father of Ethel, a war veteran, is constantly boasting of his prowess on the field of battle, and telling what he will do if accosted by a bandit. One comes along and father flees. Jack thinks to take the bandit's place in order to scare the old man. He does this, but gets arrested. Ethel finds the real bandit and asks his help. He turns up in the court-room, holds them all up and tells the truth, later making his escape. Jack is freed and married right then and there.

"Into the Lions' Pit." (Powers. Two Reels.)—Diaphanous skirts are not a new thing by a long way, take it from this picture of ancient Rome. Edwin August and Ethel Davis play the leads. Marius, a warrior, returns victorious from the wars and meets Lygia, a Christian girl, with whom he falls in love. His former favorite, Dacia, together with Casius, plot against the girl's life. Abducting her, they cast her into a lions' den. It is in this picture that Miss Davis was so badly injured. She is dropped from a great height to a stone floor. Marius, hearing of the girl's plight, rushes to the rescue and saves her.

"Influence of Sympathy." (Victor. Two Reels.)—With Florence Lawrence and Ernest Fox playing the leading parts one naturally looks forward to a good picture. This story is very pretty, indeed. The little daughter of very loving parents dies, and the mother is inconsolable. They adopt a little girl from an orphan asylum, but it is useless. She thinks of suicide, and when she is about to attempt it meets a little cripple girl, whom she takes home. It is this little girl that breaks the link from the past.

"The Leper's Coat." (Rex. Two Reels.)—A very good story, teaching a valuable lesson that may, however, fly over the heads of any but a very intelligent audience. The Smalleys, assisted by Rupert Julian, play the leading parts. A man having dined with a doctor who is taking care of a leper reaches home to find that he has been wearing the leper's coat. In a frenzy of fright he rushes out, not knowing nor caring where he goes, finally reaching a Christian Scientist's house, where he is taken in. The doctor arrives later and tells him that the coat was his own and the man believes and is no longer worried. A few years later the man receives word from the doctor that the coat was really the leper's, thus making a good ending. A story of conjugal unhappiness runs through the tale.

"The Dublin Horse Show and Other Events Across the Water." (Kalem. Nov. 21. Split Reel.)—Same reel as "The Laundress and the Lady." Besides the Horse Show the following subjects were shown: Amateur wrestling in England, Robin Hood Rifles of London, Grand Prix Motor Race in Paris, athletic sports in France, and the famed water bicycles in Nogent-sur-Marne, France. A sort of "Kalem Weekly."

"His Chorus Girl Wife." (Lubin. Nov. 21.)—Whenever a disreputable woman is needed for a part she is always called a chorus girl. Robert meets a chorus girl and immediately marries her. He soon discovers she is untrue and they are legally separated. Robert becomes a minister in a small town. His wife locates him and demands "silence money." In the argument she falls from a window and is killed. The minister then marries one of his parishioners, his resignation being refused.

"The Schemers." (Vitagraph. Nov. 21.)—John Bunny and Flora Finch are certainly a great combination. Bunny as an inebriated husband is great. To get to the club he makes a clever dummy in his bed. When he returns his wife thinks the dummy a burglar. So the husband puts her out of the room and commences a strenuous "fight" with the dummy. He is, of course, greeted as a hero.

"Natives of Australia." (Patheplay. Split Reel. Nov. 21.)—Same reel with "The Pond Snail" and "In the Spanish Pyrenees." Three good subjects. Treats of the Aborigines in Victoria, explaining the boomerang and various dances. Women weaving baskets and men making shields are also shown.

"A Good Sport." (Edison. Two Reels. Nov. 21.)—A very fine picture. The idea is clever and original and the action perfect. A kind of exposé of the inside of the "game." Mabel Trunelle, Herbert Prior, Gertrude McCoy, William West and Bigelow Cooper play the largest parts. An Englishman comes to America, arriving here pretty "down and out." He is very much of a dude, but gets a job at five dollars a day with a motion picture manufacturer. He works hard and becomes a leading man. His fiancée in England sees him in a picture kissing a girl and immediately sends for him. So he goes, leaving his leading lady. The caustic subtitles were especially good. A little knock was given the Censorship Board. The "Western" scene was particularly fine. Much laughter from the audience when they saw how simple the scenery is.

"The Pond Snail." (Patheplay. Split Reel. Nov. 21.)—Same reel with "Natives of Australia" and "In the Spanish Pyrenees." A splendid picture, showing the eggs and their growth under a powerful microscope. Even the heart, which is one one-thousandth of a millimeter in size, is plainly shown beating.

"In the Spanish Pyrenees." (Patheplay. Split Reel. Nov. 21.)—Same reel with "The Pond Snail" and "Natives of Australia." Beautiful scenery on top of high mountains is the chief attraction of this picture. Frozen lakes, 7,200 feet above sea-level, are very pretty.

"In the Fangs of Jealousy." (World Special Films Corporation. Two Parts. Made by the Paris Eclair Company.)—

A perfect story, with clean action throughout. The photography is good and the acting excellent. A famous actress, under an assumed name, meets with an accident in front of the home of an author. They become too intimate for the wife to stand, and the actress leaves. Later they meet again in Paris and she agrees to produce the play of the author. It is a great success. The wife, jealous, substitutes ball cartridge for the blank ones used, and wounds the leading lady on the stage. She confesses her crime and all are reconciled in the knowledge that the husband was interested from business reasons only.

"Kenton's Heir." (Patheplay. Nov. 22.)—A good cast and photography is responsible for this "getting across." Robert, Kenton's son and heir, is disowned and goes away. Twenty years pass by and the old millionaire is dying. The doctor knows that should he obtain a glimpse of his son it would rally him. So another man, who looks like Robert, is substituted. The old man lives through and welcomes the stranger. Harold meets Marjorie, a relative, and they become engaged. The real son, Robert, is saved from committing suicide on his father's grounds by Harold. The latter confesses his part in the deception, but by consent holds his place in the family.

"A Proposal Deferred." (Edison. Nov. 22.)—Being the fifth story of "What Happened to Mary," from the Ladies' World. Captain Bradford and Mary again meet, this time in a legal proceeding. Bradford owns a mine which Mary believes to be her property. When the boy finds that Mary is the contestant he withdraws his claim and moves away. Mary, not knowing the reason, thinks of what might have been had he proposed. The photography is perfect. The same cast as heretofore.

"Pathe's Weekly, No. 69." (Pathe. Nov. 20.)—Children being taught in the Music School Settlement in New York shows the inside workings of a philanthropic idea. Views in the Panama Canal, the pictures of which have been accepted by the Government as official records, are timely. A new device used to identify automobiles in case of accident is demonstrated. The comic section of "Bud" Fisher was well received.

"Pathe's Weekly, No. 70." (Pathe. Nov. 24.)—The subjects taken are local exclusively, the photography beyond reproach. Maggie Teyte, the prima donna, dons a queer costume and calls it the ideal one for women. Moving nail-kegs and scrap-iron with large magnets in Texas is novel. The Y. M. C. A. campaign to obtain $4,000,000 is shown in the editorial section. The U. S. Cavalry in Texas drilling for emergencies, and repairing a telephone cable under the Hudson conclude the most interesting features.

SPECIAL FILM REVIEWS

"THE Price of Human Lives." (Edison. Dec. 2.)—Taken under the auspices and for the good of the National Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis, this picture by the Edison Company is bound to be of great value, and will materially assist the work of this and other philanthropical associations.

This picture, though showing how consumption may be avoided, deals more with the cure. It is in particular a great warning against the so-called medicines that "cure" the disease, and is shown in the form of a story. In this manner it is appealing to all, the moral being sufficiently plain to prevent quacks doing a lucrative business with those seeing the film.

Sallie Crute, Augustus Phillips, Frank McGlynn and Robert Brower play the leading parts in a most satisfactory manner.

Harry Bruce and Beth Cort are engaged to be married and are very happy. Beth's father, the manufacturer of "Concura," a consumption "cure," offers Harry a good position, which the latter accepts. Nellie Linn has a bad cold, and, in answer to an advertisement in the paper, buys a bottle of "Concura," believing that it will cure her. Beth also buys a bottle of her father's product, but as she is about to take it her father stops her. She is interested in social service work and in this pursuit she meets Nellie and Eddie, her sweetheart, in their tenement.

Having received a letter from a relative to the effect that her aunt had died as the result of using "Concura" instead of a proper remedy, she goes to the offices of the company to demand that they stop selling the fake. She is surprised to find that Harry and her father are the makers of the deadly drug and breaks her engagement. She finally gets a promise from her father to stop making the "cure" and they are again happy, as Harry turns "traitor" and becomes an ardent worker for the "Red Cross Stamp Movement." Needless to say, they are married.

Nellie and Eddie are cured of their illness through the kindness of Beth, who sends them to the country, where the only cure works wonders, i. e., fresh air and sunshine with healthy food.

"The Duke's Talisman." (Gaumont. Four Reels and Prologue.)—Something similar to the "Prisoner of Zenda," and every bit as gripping and fine a story. Through four reels of perfect colored photography the action wends its way without the time lagging for a moment. You seem to forget your very presence and surroundings. A Duke being pursued by revolutionists is hidden by a farmer and his daughter. In parting he presents the girl with a ring by which she may ask any favor. Times get better and the Duke returns to his kingdom, where he sets a price on the head of the revolutionist. The girl loves the Duke's enemy and warns him of his danger. A Countess, who also loves the man, hides him from his relentless pursuers. Later, however, seeing that he loves the farmer's daughter, she tells his hiding place. He is captured. The girl goes to the Duke with his ring. He says the execution must go through, but it will be mock. So the man is apparently shot, but later "returns to life" and together they go away. The wonderful shades of colors used in this picture are worth much to see. It was a great pleasure for the writer to review such a film. The costumes are of Napoleon's time and are gorgeous.

"Trapped in a Forest Fire." (American.)—This one-reel production gives some splendid views of a forest fire, whose scorching flames spread and zigzag over the mountainside, destroying everything in its course. A story has been built by the American Company in which this devastation plays a big part.

Robert Newton, a young business man, and his mother give a house-party at his shooting lodge in the Adirondack Mountains.

Among the invited guests are Vera Stanton, a young romantic girl, with whom Robert is in love, and Inez Tremain, who in her turn loves Robert. To complicate matters, Inez is loved by Tom Nevins, a friend of Robert.

Nevins proposes to Inez and is refused laughingly. While sitting on the veranda later on, Inez sees Robert and Vera start for a walk and follows them, overhearing Robert propose and being rejected because he was too practical.

Trying then to win Robert by fair means and failing because of his thoughts of Vera, she decides to remove Vera from his life. To this end she sends for Dick Graham, an adventurer friend of hers, to come and camp near them, thinking because of his dashing ways and Vera's romantic turn of mind he can win her. Graham is agreeable, as Vera is rich and he is looking for money.

A few days after his arrival Inez takes Vera to Graham's camp. Some time later Rover, who has been hunting, happens upon the scene and, being introduced to Graham, invites him to call.

Graham calls one evening and makes an appointment with Vera to meet her in a picturesque nook in the forest. On the evening of the appointment, while waiting to meet Vera, he passes the time smoking, throwing his half-smoked cigarette in the dry leaves. Arriving at the meeting place, he smells smoke and looking back sees the fire. He becomes panic-stricken and rushes to the shooting lodge, leaving Vera to her fate, as she arrives a few minutes afterwards.

All is disorder at the lodge, Graham has alarmed everyone. The cars come on and, loaded to capacity, start for safety, Graham and Inez in the first car. Robert misses Vera. With her brother James and his friend, Tom Nevins, he goes in search of her. It is only after braving the scorching flames that he finds her hemmed in on all sides by the blaze. He returns to the lodge with her and she decides that she prefers a practical man.

"Zuza, the Band Leader." (Keystone. Two Reels.)—The best comedy that the Keystone Company has put out in a long time. Ford Sterling, the unequaled comedian (of his class) plays the lead and is supported by Mabel Normand. Both have exceptional opportunities for distinguishing themselves and take advantage of them. The band leader, composer of "The Chicken's Dream," is much beloved by all the ladies, to such an extent that it becomes monotonous. Mabel's lover causes all the excitement by trying to kill the leader. There are the usual chases, with action every moment.

"For the Family Honor," or "The Heart's Highway." (World Special Film Corporation. Two Reels.)—The scenes of this picture are laid among the snow-clad mountains of Switzerland, and consequently the views are wonderful. Local atmosphere is given by scenes depicting sleigh-riding and other sports. Two sisters and a brother are their father's idols. The son attends college in Paris, working his way through by playing the piano in a café. The younger sister elopes with a man who had helped her in an accident and goes to Paris. The man is also instrumental in assisting the brother, though the relationship between them is not known. When the older sister and brother call to thank Jean they meet their sister, who is now his wife. They are separated through the man's mother, who refuses her blessing. Later they are joined in a touching scene, when the son is very ill. Blanche was played by Rose Sylvaire, her sister by Josette Andriot, and Charles Krauss played Jean.

"Star of India" (Blache Features—four parts). With its opening and closing scenes laid in India, that land of mystery where Adventure is supposed to stalk unchecked, and New York used as the locale for the intervening scenes, this four-part film makes an excellent vehicle for several novel and startling features.

There are magnificent palace scenes, the Star of India, a huge diamond in the temple protected by serpents galore, and a blind priest, a race through the air on a slack wire, a den of thieves, a floooded sewer which snuffs out several lives, a fight on a mountain top, elephants and several other unusual elements.

The cast is good enough to ensure attention. Fraunie Fraunholz plays the male lead, Captain Kenneth, a military attache. Opposite him is Claire Whitney, of blond beauty and considerable ability. Others seen on the screen are James O'Neil, Theodore Burkhardt, Willie Boyd, Andrew Rogers, Joseph Levering, Fred English and Harold Baker.

When the story is told the many opportunities for the coveted thrill will be seen. Guarded in the Rajah's palace is an ugly idol with the Star of India in its forehead. This is an enormous diamond. It is gifted with the power of making all those who see it desire insanely to possess it. A military attache seeing the jewel, laboriously tunnels through the ground to the palace, steals the diamond, but is poisoned by one of the snakes guarding it, and eventually he dies.

The diamond falls into the hands of an American surveyor, who almost loses his life in getting it, for the stone is also coveted by his Hindu servant, who later follows him across the Atlantic with evil designs. When the surveyor's sweetheart sees the stone, she insanely desires it.

His rival undertakes to get it for her on the promise that she would marry him if he succeeded. Both he and the Hindu engage the same gang of crooks as assistants in their attacks on the surveyor. The diamond changes hands several times. Each man who temporarily gets it dies a horrible death. During the days of trial and struggles the lovers unite against the gang. The stone finally is returned to India, where it continues to glitter as "The Guiding Star of India."

All of the opportunities to make the feature a thriller are made the most of on the screen. The result is a four-part feature which richly justifies its length and name.

"Exchangemen and Their Troubles"

Is the title of a series of splendid articles to begin shortly in The Motion Picture News. We were greatly surprised to find, after reading some of the articles in this series already submitted, that there are so many different ways, as yet untried, by which exhibitors and exchangemen can co-operate to the profit of both.

It is really worth anyone's time to read these stories. The first will appear in an early issue.

If you are not now receiving The Motion Picture News, just tear off and fill in the form in the lower right hand corner, pin it to a check or bill, and mail to

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality — that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

CONFIDENCE IN Simplex IS ITS CREDIT

Business—life itself—would be a failure were it not for CONFIDENCE. Without it, CREDIT were impossible.

The strongest test—the final analysis—of a film is applied in its own studio. There it is projected upon the screen and subjected to exhaustive expert criticism before delivery to the trade.

PROJECTION in its BEST FORM must be utilized here, so that every detail in the film may be clearly revealed.

It is to the CREDIT of SIMPLEX (and shows the CONFIDENCE placed in it) that

Just ONE Big Thing in Motion Pictures Is Now Talked About All Over the Country

"MUTUAL MOVIES"

Look for the Sign of the Wing-éd Clock

Look for the Sign of the Wing-éd Clock

You've seen the BIG ADVERTISING in the Newspapers, in the Saturday Evening Post, in all the Trade Papers, and

You KNOW What the MUTUAL Is Going to Do

Big Advertising always has one SURE result:

It Makes Everybody Want to See THE THING ADVERTISED

That's why millions of people, all over this Continent, are now asking where they can see the "MUTUAL MOVIES."

And they are hunting the Theatres that show

"The Sign of the Wing-éd Clock"

They are asking to see the "Funny Fat Man," the "Two Men and a Mule," and they will keep asking for "The Mutual Girl," for months to come.

When EVERYBODY is asking to SEE the "MUTUAL MOVIES" that is the Sign YOU want over your theatre.

Get the MUTUAL Service; hang up the MUTUAL Banner, and "The Sign of the Wing-éd Clock."

And get the CROWDS into YOUR Theatre, with the help of this BIG ADVERTISING, that is yours absolutely free.

BRANCHES IN 49 CITIES MUTUAL FILM CORPORATION NEW YOR

THE ONLY WAY

These are perilous times for the Exhibitor. One false step is likely to put him out of the running altogether, or to give his competitors a chance to gain a lead that can be made up again only by a wonderful rally or a shower of luck.

The exhibitor's field has changed to a wilderness. The entrance is "wide open." It never was so "wide" before. But the honest guide that points the one sure pathway is obscured by a hundred and one new sign posts of indirection to new and strange by-paths. Many of these by-paths start with tempting stretches of fine macadam and lead to a dismal swamp. Others wind and twist and end up close to where they start, while some are mere blind lanes, seemingly without end, coaxing the traveler on and on until he drops of sheer exhaustion. Right down through the centre of the woods, along a safe, dry ridge, is the straight, unfaltering pathway through to the palace of success. It is worn smooth and hard with the tramping of many feet. It is broad enough for all, and easy passing for those who keep their wits about them. Yet truly, these are perilous times.

The wide open gateway is the so-called "open market", the strange misleading by-paths are the overnight "features", and harum-scarum programs of unskilled "manufacturers". The bewildering new sign posts are the extravagant promises of their advertisements. The dismal swamp is debt; the track that doubles back to where it starts is the show that works on for mere expense, and the "blind lane" is the losing show that coaxes its stubborn owner on and on until he goes plum broke and stops for good and all.

The one safe, smooth, well beaten pathway direct to success, the first and last one through the wilderness, is Licensed Service. It was laid by the pioneers—the giants of the Motion Picture game—The first and ever the leading makers of high class films.

The grand army of successful exhibitors followed this path. The guide was General Film.

PATENT MEDICINE "CAMILLE."

New Orleans, Nov. 19.

The Honey-Tar Stock Co. ... ...t a suburban theatre last week. During the first act Friday evening, the leading lady coughed through her part. She coughed not at all during the second.

During the intermission between acts two and three a bearded, medical-looking person stepped before the curtain and further impressed on the audience the knowledge the leading lady had coughed during the first act but failed to repeat.

"I administered my Honey-Tar remedy during the first intermission," he said, "and she could not have coughed hereafter had she desired to. The ushers will now pass this celebrated remedy among you."

To-morrow night," he concluded, "we will present 'Camille.' As you are probably aware, Camille coughs excessively in the last act, prior to her death. Our version is changed in this respect. No member of the Honey-Tar Stock Co. could possibly die of a cough. I thank you!"

LOST IN THE WOODS.

Cincinnati, Nov. ...

...aspar Orr, who was ahead of Holly and Woods' "A Night in Paris" musical comedy company, which closed at Bellefontaine, O., last week, was the only survivor to reach Cincinnati. The others are following the steel trail somewhere.

Fletch Brothers, of this city, backed the show and lost $3,000. "A Night in Paris" was out two months. It booked independently in one-night stands. Orr had trouble getting the first class houses. He frequently found the most desirable hotels occupied by a cheaper attraction. The Reubens shied at paying $1.50 and $1 to see musical comedy when they could get mellerdramer at half that price. At Bellefontaine, O., one night, Orr's company took in $30.

"We might have done that if we ever got to Paris, Ky.," sighed Orr.

HUSBAND MANAGING WIFE.

Grace George is again under her husband's (William A. Brady) management, as the new show in which she will appear is being formulated under his direction.

"The Younger Generation" and "Half Hour," which Miss George played at the Lyceum, moved on to Cincinnati Monday, where it opened with Martha Friedman in the former George roles.

Miss Hedman and the two pieces will open an engagement at the Blackstone, Chicago, next Monday.

UNFUNNY "FUNNY" FILMS HURT.

Unfunny "funny" films are to get the gate. Films that are funny only because they are classified as comics are to be sent back to their manufacturers with a protest.

The greater part of 1,500 picture managers in town are a unit in declaring that nine out of ten of the so-called "comics" of the movies are really "chasers."

The exhibitors believe the fault is with the manufacturers and are saying so. Scarcely a day goes by that doesn't bring its quota of jeers from exhibitors leveled at the manufacturers' designed film jokers.

One well-known movie manager, saying he voiced the opinion of more than 500 exhibitor associates, shot a note into the Vitagraph last Tuesday begging that the alleged funny films be suspended, as they are costing him patronage.

The same exhibitor declared every company, save one, that he had done business with during the selection of films for three houses for four years had lost the trick of making movie audiences laugh.

The heads of the film companies he claimed weren't keeping close enough to their scenario departments. Men who hadn't a funny bone in their bodies were passing on submitted comic scenarios. Women, never temperamentally humorists, were judging submitted laughmakers. Editors and directors, refined a thousand miles beyond the degree of the average movie fan, were deciding what was amusing. The laugh bug had been emasculated.

The particular complainant begged the Vitagraph, on behalf of himself and his fellow managers, to go back to the old Keystone style of semi-horse play. He cited the Keystone's uproarious pool game film as an illustration of the sort of stuff that made his audiences rock in their chairs. He instanced "Bingles at a Cabaret" as a recent example of unfunny "funny" film. He said he had handled the output of all the syndicates during his four years' movie management, and that to-day none of the companies save the Keystone was living up to the old laugh standards. He said further that unless exhibitors could count on funny films in funny film deliveries, the exhibitors of which he was a club member, would probably establish a funny film factory of their own.

Distinctive Projection

Few motion picture projecting machines are distinctive and few depict the perspective of the picture.

The machine that is not distinctive is lost in the grey mass of mediocrity.

Power's Cameragraph No. 6A

Meets every requirement, is distinctive in every sense of the word and noticeably distinctive in the clearness of its projection.

Our projectors have met with such phenomenal success that it would be an injustice to yourself and patrons to think of installing other than the POWER'S PERFECT PROJECTOR.

TYPOGRAPHY IN ADVERTISING

BUYING space is one thing; and filling it is quite another.

OFTENTIMES the advertiser is inclined to believe that his effort ends with the space he orders and its position; it is up to the publication then to give the hoped-for results.

AS a matter of fact the effort just begins with the purchase of space.

I KNOW of one trade-journal advertiser—a very successful one—who spends more money in filling his space than in buying it.

HE goes to such an extreme, in fact, that most people would regard him as wildly extravagant. But his copy is so unique, so striking, so powerful that his single page actually dominates the entire advertising section of every journal he uses.

I REFER to "Klaxon" advertising. There is no better.

IN filling space, the idea, the copy, the art work are of great importance.

BUT there is one effect too generally overlooked; that is typography. You will note I put this in italics—for emphasis. That's typography.

THE Germans are way ahead of us in the field. Many of their printers are artists—as they should be.

BUT we are creeping up on them.

I KNOW of one young man in New York who gets six dollars an hour as a consulting typographist. He gets it—from a number of keen advertisers—because he knows typography and because few printers do.

HE will take a printed page—the kind that makes you wrinkle your brow before you begin to read it—and transform it. When he gets through you read it with a smile. He makes you want to read it.

FOR several years he worked for an advertising agent—with the result that you could tell this agent's copy at a glance wherever you saw it. Advertising men knew at once every time this agent acquired a new client. Every bit of copy put out had a rare quality of distinction.

"WHY is it," asked another agent, "that your copy is always just above mine? I pay more money for copy and art work than you do."

THE other agent smiled and kept his secret.

THE answer was—typography.

THE creed of this typographist is delightfully simple. He merely says: "Make it easy to read." But few know how to do this.

HIS art—and it is an art—is not the addition of matter but on the contrary the utter elimination of everything that is superfluous. He will construct an inexpensive booklet out of two kinds of type and a ten-point rule in red. But if you put it side by side with a heavily embossed, four-color booklet of one hundred times the cost you will pick up the little booklet first and read it through—and again.

JUST two kinds of type and a red rule!

BUT they are the right kind of type—for the kind of booklet. They make just the right combination—for the eye. They are spaced right; they vary at just the right moment; they have just the right margins. And on some pages there is just one—or no words at all—to please or rest the eye. And there are rare tricks of type and rule effects.

IT sounds easy, but it is an art.

"MAKE it easy to read."

THAT is the secret of why—when the reader looks through the advertising pages—he will select one and settle down to read it with a smooth brow and a thoughtful mind—of why he will scowl, mentally or physically, at a page black and indigestible with a mass of different type, each of which swears at the other.

AND that is why the one page will pull results for the advertiser and the other will fall flat.

PATENTS COMPANY PILES UP EVIDENCE

J. Stuart Blackton, Thomas Armat, Frederick A. Anthony, Thomas W. Stephens, L. W. Atwater and Several Exchange Men and Exhibitors on the Stand

CUMULATIVE evidence, along the lines previously followed by the defense, was introduced by the Motion Picture Patents Company at considerable length this week when the hearings in the Federal anti-trust suit were resumed.

J. Stuart Blackton, secretary of the Vitagraph Company of America; Harry Marsey, a Buffalo exhibitor; L. W. Atwater, of the Nicholas Power Company; J. A. Schuchert, manager of the Buffalo branch of the General Film Company; Charles F. Haring, a Jersey City exhibitor; Matthew Hansen, a Yonkers exhibitor; Robert Etris, manager of the Twenty-third street branch of the General Film Company in New York City; Frederick A. Anthony, of the E. and H. T. Anthony Company; Thomas W. Stephens, president of the Ansco Company; Harry Schwalde, manager of the General Film Company's Philadelphia branch; Abraham Greenberg, a Camden, N. J., exhibitor, and Edward M. A. Super, a Bristol, Pa., exhibitor, were the witnesses on Monday, Tuesday and Wednerday.

J. Stuart Blackton was the first witness on Monday. Under direct examination by Charles F. Kingsley he took up an old suit brought in September, 1900, by the Edison Company against the Vitagraph Company of America, and Walter Arthur, as its general manager, over motion picture cameras.

After the suit had been filed, Mr. Blackton said, the Vitagraph Company made negatives, turned them over to Edison and, in return, received a royalty on the sale of positive prints. A memorandum was introduced concerning the sale of tropical films of the Galveston flood.

THIS agreement with Edison was terminated by Edison in January, 1901. Litigation started later and continued through 1905, 1906 and 1907. Mr. Blackton then talked a while on the Armat suits, after which he was excused until the Tuesday afternoon session.

Harry Marsey, owner of the Happy Hour Theatre at 525 Main street, Buffalo, was the next witness. He told of his six years' experience, and said that in 1907 film service was poor, that he couldn't keep his program clear or safely advertise films in advance of their showing. These conditions have now been remedied, he said,

L. W. Atwater, of the Nicholas Power Company, was the first witness Monday afternoon. He talked first about prices and models of projection machines. He said that the output of the Nicholas Power Company is the largest of any company, from four to five thousand a year.

J. A. Schuchert, manager of the Buffalo branch of the General Film, came next. He formerly owned the Buffalo Film Exchange, which he sold to the General Film. He expressed himself as pleased with the transaction and talked of the improvement in trade conditions since 1908.

On Tuesday Mr. Schuchert opened the session with a discourse on booking systems.

Next came Charles F. Haring, an exhibitor of six years' standing, who is interested in several theatres. They are the Palace, 49 Seventh avenue, Brooklyn; the Airdome, 425 Fourteenth street, Brooklyn; the National, Bleecker street and Central avenue, Jersey City; the New Amsterdam, 100 Summit avenue, West Hoboken; the Arena, John street and Bergen avenue, Union Hill; the Airdome, 448 Central avenue, Jersey City, and a theatre now being built at 176th street and St. Nicholas avenue, New York City. He said that his competitors are furnished with pictures by the Greater New York Film Rental Company before he shows them after advertising them. He talked on trade conditions.

Matthew Hansen, of 566 West 180th street, New York City, came next. He is the manager of the Square Amusement Company of Yonkers, which operates the Getty Square, New Empire and New Star Theatres in Yonkers.

ROBERT ETRIS, of 1033 East Thirty-fifth street, Brooklyn, manager of the Twenty-third street branch of the General Film since May, 1911, followed Hansen. He was with the Lubin Film Service for three years, and said that the unsettled conditions before the formation of the General Film Company hindered business.

The next two witnesses were Frederick A. Anthony, of Hackensack, of the E. and H. T. Anthony Company, which bought the Latham loop patent issued in 1902 for $11,000, and Thomas W. Stephens, president of the Ansco Company, which absorbed the Anthony concern and a banker, a member of the firm of A. T. W. Stephens, of 2 Wall street. Both of these men talked on patents. They said they prosecuted the Latham suit until they "went broke" and so could do nothing.

J. Stuart Blackton, recalled for a short time, talked of old Edison and Armat suits. J. A. Schuchert was recalled for a short cross-examination.

On Wednesday a witness was Harry Schwalde, manager of the Philadelphia branch of the General Film Company since June, 1910 or 1911. He formerly owned the Electric Theatre Supply Company, of 44 North Tenth street, which he sold to the General Film. He was pleased with the deal, he said. He talked on trade conditions, taking a rap at scenic subjects in which he saw no profit.

Another witness was Abraham Greenberg, who owns the two largest motion picture theatres in Camden, N. J., and Edward M. A. Super, an exhibitor from Bristol, Pa. Both added their voices to the testimony of other exhibitors.

Thomas Armat, owner of the Armat patents applying to projection machines told of his troubles through lawsuits. Although he once had Biograph and Edison enjoined he "went broke" through paying for lawsuits. An adjournment was taken until Friday afternoon.

TOO REALISTIC A SCENE

New York newspapers have been carrying many articles involving Miss Dorothy Landers, one of the leading women in "The Pleasure Seekers," now playing at the Winter Garden, and a villain who, upon being repulsed, tried to shoot her, but failed when the revolver wouldn't go off, and received a trouncing for his pains.

There really was no cause for alarm, as here is how it happened: The Commercial Motion Pictures Company is now putting on features and, by permission of the Winter Garden management, was granted permission to take a shooting scene at the stage door. The press agent of "The Pleasure Seekers" scented a chance for a story, and sent in a call for the ambulance, while Jack Noble, director, and Jack Hopkins, villain, were rehearsing. Just as the picture was being taken the clanging of the bell notified the crowd that the ambulance and police were on the job. The crowd was quickly dispersed and Hopkins arrested, but when it was proved that the gun he carried was a toy glass pistol he was released.

The Commercial Motion Picture Company seems to have the right idea in securing appropriate stage settings.

BALKAN WAR PICTURES IN DEMAND

The success of "The Secret of Adrianople," a feature subject of the Film Releases of America, has necessitated a cable to Europe for more copies.

This Balkan War subject has been claimed by feature exhibitors to be one of the best money-getters they have handled in months. The Consolidated Film Company, Ltd., of Canada, have acquired the territorial rights to the production in the Dominion, and expect to be confronted with a large demand.

METEORIC McENNERY

TWO or three months ago a young Englishman stepped upon a steamship pier in the city of New York and took a look at the skyscrapers and other things which that town has to show the stranger. He was practically unknown in the motion-picture trade; he was sadly deficient in technical knowledge, and he had no one to advise him where to begin. But he had in his pocket the American selling rights to "A Message from Mars," and a big fund of energy, resourcefulness and "get there" ability under his hat, a combination that is a winner anywhere.

It proved a winner in New York and the rest of the country and James McEnnery cleaned up close to $30,000 in a few short weeks. In less than two months Mr. McEnnery sold the rights to "A Message from Mars" in practically every state of the union, and cleared a profit far beyond his own dreams, let alone those of his associates.

Now Mr. McEnnery, who is the American representative of the United Kingdom Film Company, is planning even bigger things. He is going back to England, where he will form a corporation with capital from that country and the United States for exhibiting in both countries. In addition to securing features from the British Isles and America, Mr. McEnnery is to go into the producing line and will have a studio in the West. His plans now include a big Irish film, with scenes taken in Ireland, and a four-reel production, entitled "King Charles," a feature which will be staged on the field of Worcester, the original battleground where the unfortunate British monarch made history.

HE USED TO BE A COWBOY!

It has been said that Mr. McEnnery made his big start in the motion-picture field when he sold Marcus Loew the New York City rights to "A Message from Mars," thereby gaining unusual publicity for the production. Doubtless this helped, but those who know Mr. McEnnery do not hesitate to assert that his ultimate success would have been the same.

A sketch of his life reads like a page torn from a romance. For eight years he was a cowboy, bronco buster and rancher in Northwestern Canada. He fought through the Boer War, sold polo ponies and has followed the hounds in every quarter of the world.

Mr. McEnnery's rise in the motion-picture world is in its very nature meteoric. He knows life in many of its most interesting forms and phases, which, after all, is where the film is strongest—in depicting upon the screen real dramas of real life.

Mr. McEnnery's experience well fits him for producing, even if he has as yet gained no first-hand knowledge of the technique of motion pictures. He has had phenomenal success thus far, assimilating American ideas far more quickly than most of his fellow countrymen are able to, and this should be a forecast of his future rise here in the realm of the film.

Because his rise has been so meteoric, there may be those who think that McEnnery is now at his perihelion and will gradually grow less on the motion-picture horizon as time goes on. These folks should meet McEnnery. Then they will change their minds. He is a man who is bound to strike thirteen wherever he goes and in whatever walk of life he may be thrown. He has assisted in making some history on the frontier of Northwestern Canada and in the Boer War, as already hinted. Now he will make some more in the motion-picture field.

McEnnery is a restless spirit. His past performances prove that. He is now busy over in England digging up the capital for his projected $100,000 corporation. Projected corporations are so common in the motion picture business that the phrase "I'm going to start a company" does not carry much weight.

But McEnnery's case is different. He has accomplished things. He has a tangible record on which to stand.

Right now he is a meteor but the star gazers who have followed his course say he threatens to become a fixed star of the first magnitude. M. C.

TALKING MOTION PICTURES

BY SAMUEL WEIN

IN the present-day talking motion-picture systems use is made of simultaneously recording and reproducing animated objects and sounds by means of combining the motion-picture machine and the phonograph; the success attained thereby is of very little practical importance, owing to the difficulty of ensuring perfect synchronism. Another method recently patented was to record the sound waves from the needle of the phonographic "sound box" on the same film with the motion pictures; the success attained in this method was of no value at all on account of the fact that duplicates were impossible to make and not only that, but that the film in order to reproduce the sounds therefrom must be slightly thicker than it is, otherwise the sounds will not be reproduced successfully.

To obtain the correct reproduction of the movements of the persons or objects in combination with sound waves, it is essential that the simultaneous movements and sounds should be recorded and reproduced simultaneously in exact synchronism, and that the sound waves which constitute the sounds should not suffer any variation in the process of recording and reproduction, but should be recorded and reproduced without the introduction or accompaniment of any other sound waves.

It is obvious, therefore, that no true record or reproduction of the sound waves could be made by any mechanical process or means in which a hard substance necessary to make the impression comes in contact with another hard substance, such, for instance, as the recording or reproducing pin of the phonograph, because the friction caused between the two hard substances itself creates vibration or sound waves which accompany, vary, or modify the sound waves which it is desired to record and reproduce, and are recorded and reproduced with the latter, proving detrimental to their true reproduction.

THE record, therefore, must be taken or produced without any contact between the medium caused to vibrate by the sound waves and the record or recording substance. It is further obvious that if the impressions of the movements and sounds were recorded separately on separate records, the movements and sounds would be liable to vary in point of time and fail to synchronize with each other.

Another disadvantage of the present-day talking motion-picture machines or systems is that if the operator either neglectfully or wilfully tears or cuts out a piece of the film which constitutes the movements or actions the result would be that a certain amount of action or movement is missing. As the equivalent in sounds would still be in the phonographic record, however, the device would be put out of synchronism at this point.

In order to avoid this liability and ensure correct synchronism the late Dr. Ernst Ruhmer, of Germany, in 1901, in his experiments with the "photographophone," was the first to suggest that the "movements and sounds must be recorded (photographically) simultaneously on the same photographic film."

Whereas, in a method of this kind, should a certain length of the film be either accidentally or wilfully cut off, both the action or movements and its equivalent in sound waves would be cut off, as it has already been stated that the action and the sounds are recorded (photographically) side by side on the same motion-picture film. Thus perfect synchronism at all times between action and the sounds is ensured.

The sound waves as well as the actions or movements of the objects which produce them are necessarily at a considerable distance from where the record must be taken, and they must also be reproduced at a considerable distance from the reproducing apparatus; it is, therefore, essential to provide a means of receiving the sound waves and transmitting them to a recording apparatus about to be described and a means of reproducing the photographic sounds at a distance.

FOR the purpose of collecting or receiving the sound waves, a sensitive telephone transmitter is employed to transmit the sound waves electrically (in the usual manner) from the place where the sounds originate to the motion-picture camera, which has a source of light so arranged that it will vary in degrees as to area, quantity, intensity and corresponding effect of light and shade, proportioned to their period and amplitude, simultaneously with the recording photographically of the successive movements of the objects on the same film.

When such a record is obtained it is reproduced by causing light to pass through that portion of the film containing the record of the successive movements. These are so projected on a screen as to simultaneously cause light to pass through that portion of the film containing the photographic sound record, and thence onto a selenium cell which is connected in series with a battery and a loud-speaking telephone receiver.

ITALY INSTRUCTS BY FILMS

That motion pictures are being used to instruct illiterate voters in Italy is information furnished by Alexander W. Weddell, American consul at Catania, Italy. In a letter to the Daily Consular and Trade Reports, he says:

"The task of educating the new voters to cast their ballots properly is a heavy one. As a means to this end the motion picture theatres throughout this district have exhibited films showing graphically the procedure to be followed: in addition the representatives of one of the political parties have exposed similar films in local assembly rooms. This means of educating the public has been so favorably received that similar methods for teaching the elements of domestic and personal hygiene and similar subjects are beginning to be discussed by physicians and others.

OH, IT'S AN INTERESTING LIFE!

Punctuated by GEORGE D. PROCTOR

JUST as Nature hates a vacuum, so does the motion picture business hate quietude. With an unseen hand the kaleidoscope was given an awful smack during the week, and now the map looks much different in spots. Looking from the outside in, these few changes of a week's making may be discerned: J. A. Berst leaves Pathe; Oscar Apfel, director, and Irving Cummings, leading man, follow suit; Stanly Twist (with no "E" in Stanly) goes to Australia as head of the producing end of a big new firm; Phil Klein, of All Star, returns from Europe, smiling; the Exclusive Service of the General Film is to be discontinued and Exclusive Feature Photoplay masterpieces may be discerned on the horizon; Louis A. Selznick resigns as general manager of Warners Features, Inc.; the bomb announcing the new producing company to work along lines parallel to the Famous Players and All Star threatens to burst any time; Marcus Loew's Broadway Theatre is going back to the "legit," and the New York exhibitors' ball draws near.

J. A. Berst, vice-president of the Pathe Freres, and head of that company in America since it opened offices here in 1904, resigned last Saturday. Paul Bonvillian arrived here post haste from Paris. Meanwhile, I understand, the resignation has not been definitely accepted and H. C. Hoagland has picked up the reins.

Mr. Berst's resignation is considerable of a surprise. The commanding position which Pathe Freres occupy in this country is commonly laid to his business ability. He has always been a prominent figure among the throne men of the Patents Company and the General Film. Now he picks up his hat and coat and walks out.

That interests of his own will occupy his time in future is the official explanation. A few weeks ago Dame Rumor had it that Mr. Berst was to go into the exhibiting end of the business in a large way with plenty of capital. Maybe there was something to that yarn. Quien sabe, hombre?

Philip Klein, treasurer of the All Star Feature Corporation and son of Charles Klein, the playwright, has returned from Europe. "We have started negotiations," said Phil, "whereby we line up with some of the biggest English authors such as Henry Arthur Jones, Pinero, Sims and George Bernard Shaw. We are primarily producing pictures for America, and I think that American stars for America is a good axiom, so I did not go after any English players."

Phil smiled cannily as he said his trip was successful, but he couldn't tell all he had accomplished. Then he changed the subject to film conditions abroad. Western subjects, cowboys and Indians are now down and out, he said. Europe has cried "enough."

These be troublous times for censors. The Woman's National Council met in Chicago recently and declared "Chicago is a prudish old maid" after getting a first-hand impression of the doings of the Chicago police censors. The goats of Sergeants Funkhouser and O'Connor are reported to be tearing madly up and down State street. When the censors are responsible for Chicago being called prudish, it is high time to change the subject.

Another film man is to invade the legitimate field as a producer. Marcus Loew is going to turn his Broadway theatre over to theatrical productions, starting December 22d with Mimi Aguglia, the Italian actress, playing "Salome," "Zaza" and "Electra" in Italian. "Broncho Billy" Anderson's company, producing musical comedies at a dollar a throw, will open up in the new Strand Theatre as soon as it is finished. Meanwhile, down at Joe Weber's Theatre, the Universal seven-part "Traffic in Souls" is doing an enormous business. The theatre has been enlarged and several times the police have been called to keep the crowd around the box-office in order, according to the New York dailies.

Mabel Normand, leading woman with Keystone, will hereafter direct every picture in which she appears. Madame Blache has been the only woman director for some time, but she now has a rival in Mabel who will both act and direct.

Hopp Hadley, who, like Homer, is a student of human nature, says every woman must shed so many tears a week. So he sends the missus to a sob show Monday nights to insure a clear atmosphere. They haven't had a quarrel yet. Oh, try it yourself.

L. Marcus, president of the Notable Feature Film Company, of Salt Lake, Utah, "just dropped in" from beyond the "Rockies," and has some interesting things about pictures in the West.

His people, he says, are 'way ahead of the East in their demand for an appreciation of high-class films. They want features—the very best features. They pack the houses that exhibit such pictures, and, by the way, Salt Lake boasts of the finest picture theatre in the world—the American, H. A. Sims, manager. Paderewski gives a concert there on January 6—the first occasion on which the theatre has been devoted to anything other than pictures.

"The exhibitors of the far West," said Mr. Markus, "are opposed to sensational pictures, titles and posters. Their audiences do not want them. Many of our best present-day features, while not sensational, convey that impression to the exhibitor through their titles and advertising. That, in my opinion, or rather, from the standpoint of my customers, "is a mistake."

William T. Oldknow, of Atlanta, Ga., president of the Consolidated Film and Supply Company, which covers the nine Southern states with the Universal program, made a three-day visit to New York.

George Kleine cables from Rome the announcement that he will add a cash prize of one thousand dollars for the best scenario written by an American. This is in addition to the prizes offered by the Cines Company, which range from the capital prize of five thousand dollars down to one hundred francs.

Irving Cummings, an established star in the photoplay firmament, signed with the Universal Wednesday. Irving started some time ago with Pathe. Then he was starred in Reliance. Recently he returned to Pathe to play in features under the direction of Oscar C. Apfel. Now he goes with the Universal. Under what brand he will appear has not yet been decided.

Elmer J. McGovern, press representative of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, is doing a "John L." every afternoon at Maclevy's gym in Fourth avenue. Elmer is quite a boxer and some day hopes to meet Chester Beecroft, his old fistic rival, who can go some with the mits.

Last Saturday night, Adam Kessel, Jr., president of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, received the surprise of his life when he was invited into Healy's, at Sixty-sixth street, by one of his friends, to a quiet little meal as he supposed, and found himself surrounded by a host of his friends, who carried him bodily upstairs to the Jungle Room, where a spread was all set in his honor. Here he was presented with a loving cup by Harry Palmer, and a painting of the famous Kessel yacht, Orson, by Ernest Warner, of the Otis Lithograph Company, Last, but not least, he was presented by George Cooke, of the Metro Lithograph Company and the All Star Feature Corporation, with a painting of himself.

Mr. Kessel declared he spent the most enjoyable evening of his life there, and threatens to have the same crowd out on the Orson every week-end for the coming summer. Mae Kenny was conspicuous by her presence.

Over the Grape Fruit

The stork has been busy going the rounds.

Frank A. Tichenor is the father of a nine-pound boy. He will be Frank, Jr.

Harvey Harris Gates, assistant editor of the Universal Weekly, and E. F. Murphy, superintendent of the Universal laboratories, are rejoicing over the advent of sons. The Gates heir will be named Hal, while Edwin John has been picked for the newest Murphy.

Our own J. F. Fairman is on the list. His is a girl, who will be named Mae Hortense.

Herbert Griffin, one of the country's best projection machine men, from a mechanical as well as a selling viewpoint, has associated himself with the Nicholas Power Company.

Seven years in the motion picture business is the record of Anna Goldman, secretary to Edward Roskam, president of the Commercial Motion Pictures Company. Miss Goldman knows the business from every angle. She's the real head of the Commercial. Eddie wi.. tell you so.

Chester Rothwell Beecroft and his accomplices, who constitute the publicity and advertising department of the General Film Company, will soon move from 200 Fifth avenue to larger quarters at 71 West Twenty-third street.

There is nothing to print this week about Joseph White Farnham, John Jazbo Noble, or Louis Seal Noto. Stamford, Manila, and Chicago papers please copy.

Consuelo Bailey, who has been leading woman with Charles Frohman, Harrison Grey Fiske, William A. Brady and the Shuberts, has signed up to play leads with Reliance. This will be her first appearance in pictures.

The All Star Feature Corporation is producing "Paid in Full." Silent Bill Haddock is the director. The cast includes Tully Marshall and Riley Hatch, of the original company; Winnifred Kingston, Katherine French, George Washington Irving, Carl Mitchell, late of Lubin, and one Tomanato in a Jap part.

Ignace Paderewski will be seen in motion pictures. He was caught face to face with "Our Mutual Girl" by Carnegie Hall en route to a recital.

The Lubin forces are at work on the first photoplay of Mae B. Havey, late of Reliance, since she joined the Lubin scenario department. It is a two-reeler, "A Pack of Cards," and deals with the Northwest Mounted Police.

John Bohemia Clymer bursts into the limelight. He has published a brochure of Clymerian verses, "Red Love" and "The One-Night Stand." They are more potent than a mustard plaster.

L. J. Rubenstein, head of the Ruby features, is the father of a six-pound baby boy. To add more joy, William Herschberg, of the General Feature Film Company, of Chicago, contracted for the entire Ruby output for Illinois and Wisconsin.

Hugh D'Arcy, the Lubin press agent, sends in a copy of the Betzwood Lenz, a humorous publication that is really humorous. It is packed with topical jokes and hits at the Lubinites.

Harry A. Samwick, representing the Exclusive Features, Inc., has purchased "Taxicab 1098," the "Traducer" and "When Paris Loves" for New York State and Greater New York.

The Universal has been taking pictures of the United States meat inspection at the Cudahy company's plant in South Omaha.

Cleo Madison is to play opposite J. Warren Kerrigan in Universal productions.

Russell Edgar Smith, late of the New York Sunday World, has joined the scenario department of the Mutual Film Corporation.

Phillips Smalley and his wife, Lois Weber, will film "The Merchant of Venice" for the Universal.

Albert Blinkhorn has gotten up an exceptionally beautiful three-sheet poster of Florence Turner. A space is reserved for a one-sheet poster of whatever Turner film the exhibitor wishes to advertise. Five colors were used, and a very attractive poster is the result.

For his David Copperfield Feature, Mr. Blinkhorn has added a twenty-sheet poster, and this picture has now a large and attractive line of advertising matter.

Beginning December 15th, three Keystone comedies will be released a week, and, in addition, one multiple-reel comedy a month. These will be issued as specials. The first of these is "Zuzu, the Band Leader," a two-reeler, with Mabel Normand and Ford Sterling. Next will come "Baffles, the Gentleman Burglar."

John Bunny, of Vitagraph, is now a member of the Motion Picture Machine Operators' Protective Union. He was presented with a gold membership card by T. C. Barrows, treasurer of the organization. W. T. Rock, president of the Vitagraph company, and Albert E. Smith, its treasurer, were present and congratulated Bunny.

Frank Donovan is now with the Manhattan Feature Film Company, of 341 Fifth avenue, as manager and press agent. This concern will start to make its own feature production early in the Spring, Frank says.

VITAGRAPH-LIEBLERS PRODUCING "THE CHRISTIAN"

THE recently formed Vitagraph-Liebler Feature Film Company, Inc., the merger of the Vitagraph Company of America and the theatrical firm of the Lieblers for the sake of producing plural-reel motion picture plays from successes on the speaking stage owned by the Lieblers, is now at work on a seven-part version of "The Christian," Hall Caine's novel and drama. This is the first of the coming series of "stage length" productions.

The production of this picture is being made under the personal direction of J. Stuart Blackton, vice-president of the company, assisted by Frederick A. Thompson, formerly a stage director with Belasco, who has been producing Vitagraph pictures for some time, and Frederick Stanhope, stage director for the Liebler Company. Eugene Mullin is the camera-man.

An especially selected Vitagraph cast will interpret the drama. Earle Williams plays John Storm. Edith Storey plays Gloria Quayle. Charles Kent, James Lackeye, Harry Northrup, Albert Gallatin, Donald Hall, James Morrison, Carlotta De Felice and Jane Fearnley are others of the principals. The beach scenes, placed in the novel on the Isle of Man, have been taken at North Scituate and Winthrop Beach, near Boston, and other places along the coast from Boston to Philadelphia.

The booking of "The Christian" on its completion will be handled by the Vitagraph-Liebler Feature Film Company, Inc.

"BOB" FITZSIMMONS A NATURAL STAR

"Bob" Fitzsimmons, the famous pugilist, will be the star of a two-reel photoplay shortly to be produced by the Mutual Film Corporation, entitled "A Fight for Life." The play is a drama of pugilism and love and is from the pen of Robert H. Davis, editor of Munsey's Magazine, who was the veteran fighter's press agent in the heyday of his success in the squared circle twenty years ago.

In the production the old master of ring-craft will meet his son, "Bob" Jr., in the roped arena and with fatherly solicitude knock out the proud possessor of his name. The youngster, although only seventeen years old, is bigger than his parent and built in the same rangy fashion, and it is "Bob" Sr.'s plan to announce on the film that he is training the boy for the ring, in the anticipation that he will prove an even greater fighter than his father.

KLEINE-CINES SCENARIO CONTEST READY

Scenario writers who expect to compete in the International Cines Scenario Contest can obtain a sheet giving the conditions of the contest by application to the Chicago offices of George Kleine. Mr. Kleine personally offers $1000.00 in addition to the prizes offered by Cines for the best scenario written by an American.

The American must have been a resident of the United States or its territories, possessions, or dependencies for at least five years. Distinctively American topics would be unwise, as the films are to be made by the Cines Company, which may not be able to provide the proper local color.

The Montgomery Amusement Company is manufacturing industrial pictures to boom the South. Three reels have been finished and will be shown first in the theatres controlled by the company.

IMPORTANT MOVE BY GENERAL FILM

Will Book Long Productions Through New Department Which Will Displace the Exclusive Service—First Picture Will Be Five-Part Lubin Production of Charles Klein's "Third Degree"

A COMING move by the General Film Company which will set an important precedent in the motion picture art was made public Friday. Several weeks ago this concern started its Exclusive Service department. This department furnished exhibitors with a twelve-reel service protecting them from direct competition in that films on the Exclusive Service program could not be shown by an opposition house until ninety days after the release date. At the time this was heralded as the solution to the problem confronting a man with a high-class theatre who wished to prevent direct competition.

Now the General Film Company plans to go still further and inaugurate a service, to be known as Special Feature Photoplay Masterpieces, which will set a new mark in the marketing of feature productions. This service will furnish, at the rate of one a week, when practicable, features long enough to furnish an evening's entertainment.

The word "feature" and the phrase "big feature" have been used often of late and thereby have lost strength, but in this case the word "feature" is used advisedly. An idea of the character of the proposed service may be gleaned from the fact that the first picture to be released on it will be a five-part version of Charles Klein's success on the speaking stage, "The Third Degree." The forces of the Lubin plant at Philadelphia have been concentrated for some time on the production of this picture.

Following features have not yet been announced. The General Film Company, however, will make this service one entirely composed of subjects good enough to play in direct opposition to the speaking stage. It is rumored that overtures have been made for the Cines production of "Antony and Cleopatra," a feature which has already received the approval of Europe, as it is considered an equal of "Quo Vadis" and "The Last Days of Pompeii," and for the production of Zola's "Germinal."

Just what plays will be released on this service can not yet be announced, as the decision to launch the new service was only made on Wednesday. It is the plan, however, to give a service composed only of impressive features. These will be booked as theatrical attractions are now booked.

An important feature of this service is that it will give the theatre devoted to motion pictures a chance to show productions of a class which hitherto have been shown for the most part in theatres intended to house legitimate attractions.

With the advent of this service, which will be started as soon as possible, probably some time in January, the present Exclusive Service will be discontinued. This service will probably be dropped December 20, it is said.

Its discontinuance means that the regular program of the General Film Company will be strengthened. Eight features are now furnished weekly by the General Film. Two more will be added. The Kalem will drop its Monday single reel picture and release a feature every Tuesday. Edison will drop its single-reeler and release a feature every Friday. This will make a total of ten features a week on the General Film program.

The new move, the Special Feature Photoplay Masterpieces, is a natural evolution from the Exclusive Service. It will be started in the belief that the day of the pretentious production which furnishes an evening's entertainment is here. It will furnish such productions regularly and to motion picture theatres. It will furnish only productions of merit. To get them it may, if necessary, go outside of the licensed manufacturers, and buy pictures of sufficient merit wherever they are found. It is an important step and will mean much to everyone interested in motion pictures.

STANLY H. TWIST OFF TO AUSTRALIA

Will Superintend Producing End of Newly Formed Australasian Films, Ltd., Which Is a Coalition of Several Concerns

STANLY H. TWIST, who was with the Selig Polyscope Company for several years, and who more recently has been associated with E. Mandelbaum and Phil Gleichman in the World Special Films Corporation, left New York on Thursday bound for Australia via Los Angeles, San Francisco and Honolulu. He is going to the Antipodes to become general manager and director of the purchasing and producing departments of the newly formed Australasian Films, Ltd., a $3,000,000 concern.

The Australasian Films, Ltd., is a combination of the interests of C. Spencer, Tate West, J. D. Williams, the Amalgamated Pictures, and Johnson and Gibson. At the present time it owns five hundred theatres in Australia, New Zealand, and the smaller islands, and has the sole rights in the Antipodes to the Pathe, Gaumont, Kalem, Lubin, Thanhouser and American pictures. The company also owns a chain of exchanges.

Now it will enter the producing end of the business in earnest. A large studio has been erected at Rushcutter's Bay, Sydney, as a cost of $50,000. Motion pictures will be produced and prominent English, American and Australian players will be secured. Millard Johnson, who represents the new concern in this country, secured Mr. Twist to take charge of things in the Southern continent.

Mr. Twist, who has already left New York, will sail from San Francisco December 16 on the Ventura, eat his Christmas dinner on the equator, and reach Sydney January 5, 1914, according to schedule.

To do business in this country, Mr. Twist and his associates have incorporated the Inter-Ocean Sales Company, a fifty-thousand-dollar concern, which will have offices in the World's Tower building, 110 West Fortieth street, with Ernest Shipman at the helm. Mr. Twist has resigned his connections with the World Special Films Company, and the Pompeii Film Company. His new concern plans to open offices later in Chicago, Los Angeles, London and Sydney.

CO-OPERATION

BY EDWARD M. SAUNDERS

General Manager of the Universal Exchanges of New York and New England.

CO-OPERATION means just one thing, i.e., the unfrictional working between the exhibitor and the exchange. Absolute harmony prevailing between these two great factors in the motion picture business means the uplift and betterment of present service. "Service" at the present time, although infinitely better than it has ever been before, can still stand improvement. But it cannot be bettered without absolute co-operation on the part of the exhibitor.

It very often happens that an exhibitor feeling offended for some reason at an exchange will seek satisfaction. But he does not injure the exchange alone, in most cases, he also hurts a brother exhibitor, who will in turn seek to injure him by "getting back" at the innocent exchange. To give an example: One exhibitor, a very good customer, will stay with an exchange for a long time, always doing his best to help the distributor. One morning he is late in getting his returns in. It has never happened before and may never happen again. Some other exhibitor is booked for these pictures, or perhaps his five reels are booked for five other customers. They are in the office waiting for the pictures, but get tired, finally, and accept something else, which they in pique also fail to return in time. Of course the exchange is blamed.

Those men do not get back at the exchange. They merely hurt some other exhibitor, who in turn hurts them. This is the result of a failure to understand the meaning of co-operation.

These other men who have been forced to accept substitutes feel very much hurt. Letters come into the office of the manager. They are angry as indeed they have some reason to be. They are thoroughly within their province and the exchange does not blame them in the least. They sympathize, but they cannot be of any help. It is, of course, impossible to keep duplicate copies of the pictures on hand. The nominal rent charged for most films will not authorize any such expense as that. Every copy made must see active service or the exchange is a loser.

One can easily see why the exhibitor feels angry. He has "billed" the town or locality announcing such and such a picture and his patrons want to see it. They are disappointed and he is disgusted. His substitute pictures are therefore late the next day in retaliation and so it will go around in a circle.

Improving the Service

Another way in which the exhibitor can assure himself of better service is by more careful care of his posters. Many of the careless managers nail up their paper on the front of the house. When the night is over instead of being removed as carefully as it was posted it is ripped off. The manager will not have to use it again and perhaps he is a little tired after a strenuous night, so down it comes. But, and it is a big "but," someone else will have to use that paper, so there is another cause for just complaint.

Posters are not ruined and torn in the office of the exchange. Great care is taken of them there. Sometimes it is a wet night and the paper instead of being carefully dried is folded and tucked into a film case and thus it is ruined in the morning. This means bad "paper" for someone.

Exchanges try to get sufficient "paper" so that there will be enough to go around. And it sometimes happens that an exhibitor will have to take a picture without any "paper," because of the carelessness of some contemporary. When paper runs out on a film it means its resignation from active service, and a consignment to the junk heap.

Injury to Films

Yet probably more important than all this is the great crying need for greater care and attention to films. The harm that can be worked by one unskilled operator on a film is tremendous. A brand new film comes to a theatre that has a green operator. The first time the operator runs the picture, when the emulsion has hardened on the tension spring he rips out irreparably all the sprocket holes. The film costing considerable time and money is thus destroyed and made useless.

To avoid this careless use of film to some extent we are at the present time sending a man on the road, who will visit and talk with every one of our exhibitors and their operators, showing them the proper methods to avoid destroying films, and also how they may get the best results. This man will be one whom we have trained for some time and who is an expert in his line. His work should be productive of much good.

The question has often been asked me, "How can I avoid repeaters, be sure of good service and get the people to come to my show?"

A method used by a few exhibitors with great success might be found advantageous in your theatre. If you have a house where you can run the same pictures two days, changing your program three times a week, you could assure yourself of better service. By a careful reading of the reviews of films in the trade papers you could follow what was worth while, go to the exchange and see it, and then get it.

Any exhibitor who takes five pictures a day and changes every day is naturally using up almost the total output of whatever exchange he deals with. So he must take the good with the bad and indifferent. But by cutting down his week's supply from thirty or thirty-five a week to fifteen a week he will have an assortment and choice that will assure him of a good show and therefore good business.

The exhibitor should remember this fact. He is not only hurting the exchange by being tardy with his returns or by destroying films and posters, but he is hurting, perhaps seriously crippling, some other exhibitor's business.

WHAT THE PEOPLE WANT

BY WILLIAM NITSCHKE
Manager of Loew's Broadway Photoplay Theatre.

IN response to a number of inquiries from contemporaries as to the best way to successfully compete with brother exhibitors I would like to write a few words. These facts I have learned from actual experience in the "game" and I believe absolutely that I am right.

"What is the reason that I don't get the business I don't get?" is a question that every exhibitor should ask himself. Analyzing the feelings of an audience is not so hard a proposition as it would seem. Perhaps it would be better to get your audience to tell you just what they want. This is not at all difficult. Have you tried the plan of distributing small cards among the people requesting them to fill the blanks in, telling you just what they want. See that every person gets one. The card might be something like this:

Name .....
Address .....
Are you a regular patron?.....
How often do you attend?.....
What make of picture do you prefer? .....
What clas of picture do you most prefer, comedy, drama, educational? .....
Do you like short "split reel" comedies? .....
Do you like two and three reel stories .....
What changes would you suggest for the general improvement of this theatre? .....

Experiment Worth Trying

Something on the above line should be productive of results, it is certainly worth the trying. The results, of course, will all differ. It is up to you then to pick the majority and then give them what they want and when they want it. Change your service if it does not please them.

What will work in New York will also be found applicable to almost any territory, with the exception of perhaps a very small town with but one exhibitor. This man will have his regular patrons, no matter what he shows.

In any city or large town, the exhibitor will have to rely greatly upon transient trade as well as his regular patrons. These latter will come every night if they get what they want. My experience with such an audience (or spectators as I would rather call them) is that they do not at the present time take a great deal of interest in the companies or the players. They come in merely to pass a pleasant hour while waiting to keep an engagement.

It is obvious that these people will appreciate short exciting dramas or clever farce comedies. They want pictures that will entertain them for the time being, but which will pass from their memory. If as an exhibitor you have this class of patron it is up to you to furnish what is wanted.

WILLIAM NITSCHKE

There are many manufacturers placing worthless "stuff" on the market. Perhaps you personally do not buy it, perhaps your neighbor does. At any rate someone does, and for the time being some will flock to that house, lured there by good paper, but the question is: Will it continue? Will the people stay with that house seeing the same thing over night after night, when they may go to another house near by and see what is worth while? "You can fool some of the people all of the time, but not most of them, to paraphrase."

Future Patronage Considered

It is necessary for the exhibitor to consider also his future patronage, the people that do not go to any but the legitimate theatres. They would want strong dramas or excellent comedies, but they will have to be "educated."

Have you tried that? A letter, or a weekly folder through the mail might bring them to your door. But they must see good stuff or they will never return. If they are satisfied you will have steady patrons.

The motion picture audience is composed of all classes. The intelligent, refined people are not in the minority by any means. But one must cater to the ignorant, or, to be kinder, to the people who have not had the opportunity, or neglected it, to gain an education. They form a large class of the theatregoers. They are the ones that like melodramas and split reel subjects, and they want variety all the time. They want and demand a good program.

Feature houses in the immediate vicinity of Times Square, New York, should prove a paying proposition. There are many large theatres in New York, but not enough to take care of the crowds and there are none that make a specialty of features on a two-a-day program.

ITALIAN QUEEN MOTHER SEES KLEINE "POMPEII"

A private showing of the Kleine-Ambrosio motion picture, "The Last Days of Pompeii," was given recently at Stupinigi, Italy, at the royal castle, an hour and half ride from the Ambrosio studio at Turin, for the Queen Mother of Italy. It was in response to a letter written by Marquis Guiccioli, gentleman-in-waiting to the Queen Mother, a translation of which follows:

"The gentleman-in-waiting to H. M., the Queen Mother,

"H. M., the Queen, would like to have an exhibition of the moving picture, 'The Last Days of Pompeii,' at the royal castle of Stupinigi. Please let me know, if it is possible, what evening would be most convenient for you.

"With my best regards,

"Marquis Guiccioli,

"Gentleman-in-waiting to the Queen Mother."

CELLULOID "SUBSTITUTES"

THE article printed last week under the caption "Substitutes for Celluloid" was in type when several newspaper references to the subject, of an indirect nature, were brought to our notice. These were precipitated by the circumstance that the use of inflammable celluloid has been forbidden by the French Government after December 31, 1914. This drastic measure has directed attention to the need, if not the urgency, of providing a substitute for celluloid film, which will meet with the approval of the French authorities.

As usual in such cases, the trade is much excited and many of the men most interested are talking rather loosely about the feasibility of making a cheap and efficient substitute. In particular, Monsieur Gaumont, the well-known motion picture maker, is quoted, or probably misquoted, as saying that somebody in this country (the United States) is making a celluloid substitute which can be sold at one cent a yard. In the present state of our chemical knowledge of the subject, this looks improbable. We are, however, making inquiries.

What will probably happen is this: The French Government will get over its needless alarm and the present kind of celluloid will continue in use for an indefinite period.

It should never be forgotten that celluloid is, after all, only another name for liquid collodion. The latter was formerly used by many thousands of photographers in all parts of the world. High fire insurance risks were imposed on the users of this liquid. Much the same spirit of alarm seems to be manifested with reference to inflammable celluloid. For those of our readers who are interested in the scientific aspect of the matter, we can refer them to the researches of Green, Cross & Bevan, the authorities on the subject of cellulose substitutes, whose papers can be found in any scientific library. They were, we think, the means of introducing aceto-cellulose instead of nitro cellulose, which after all is merely a variation of the method of treating the original cellulose. Aceto-cellulose compounds are the subject of patent litigation at the present time. The master patents, if we mistake not, are controlled in Germany.

This subject is rather recondite for the average reader or motion picture maker, but it is of much importance.

MOTION PICTURES VERSUS "MOVING" PICTURES

THE error, into which many good people had fallen, of referring to motion pictures as "moving pictures" has led to a number of humorous interpretations of this source of entertainment. Although the masses are not disposed to analyze the origin of any name or designation, there are persons who, realizing that properly projected motion pictures are virtually a quick succession of stereopticon-views, appreciate the correctness of the term "motion pictures."

In a motion-picture house the spectators are concerned only with what is displayed on the screen, and each of the numberless pictures is shown within a limited and stationary space, all of them combining to simulate motion, but the pictures themselves do not move. However, as the term "moving pictures" has come to stay, it is applied by discriminating people to inferior houses, whereas the correct and dignified term "motion pictures" refers rather to the respectable and refined character of the display and its environment.—(The Photo-Era, Boston.)

UNCLE SAM BIGGEST FILM MANUFACTURER

AN interesting statement comes from the Department of Commerce in Washington to the effect that the export of motion picture films from America this year will amount to over 25,000 miles, counting both developed films and negatives.

The value of the exports for that period was $3,467,000. It is said that this country is the largest manufacturer of motion picture films in the world, producing nearly seventy-five per cent of the total output.

FOR THOSE WHO WORRY O'ER PLOTS AND PLAYS

WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT

"YOU say to read good books in order to broaden your mind and acquire the art of style and condensation. Kindly advise us what to read?"

Several literary workers have written us recently propounding the above question.

Read the Bible. Perhaps you do not believe in the Bible? Nevertheless, read it, for the Bible is the Book of Books in more than one respect. Sir Arthur Quiller Couch, in his address on the English Bible at Cambridge, rightly laid stress on the priceless literary value of that authorized version as the greatest book of English prose. You probably have a Bible accessible and a study of its beautiful text will enrich your knowledge as a writer. Its divine simplicity, its pathos, its tenderness, every chapter instinct with beauty, every verse ringing like a sweet-toned bell, there is no other work, text-book or otherwise, that will help the photoplay author along his way more consistently than the Scriptures. Forty-seven men helped translate the Bible, none of them celebrated outside their share in the translation, for any superlative achievement.

The Bible cannot be omitted by those wishing a course of study in English literature. The authorized version has had incomparably more influence on English literary style and on our English speech than any other book, or than all other books combined.

Taine, a discriminating critic, realized how the style of the Bible has wrought itself into English life and interwoven itself into the very text of English literature. Couch, himself a famous novelist, detects the influence of the Bible in Izaak Walton and Bunyan, in Milton, and Sir Thomas Browne, in Addison and in Gibbon. Taine writes admiringly of Macaulay's Biblical metaphors; Ruskin found in the Bible the basis of his entrancing style; Thackeray, Stevenson, and old Sir Walter Scott turned to the Bible for inspiration to create and for plot germs. The art of condensation is found in the Bible as nowhere else. Fertility of plot can be discovered in almost every page. Sympathetic imagery and artistic action are all there. The Bible is in everything we see, hear, feel. It crops out in the photoplay title; in photoplay leaders and, unconsciously ofttimes, in photoplay scenes. For, be it remembered, plots taken from the Scriptures appear almost every day under other guises.

In re Acton Davies

Acton Davies, dramatic critic of the New York Sun, and recognized authority upon all things theatrical, has been engaged by the Edison Company to review all scenarios before they are turned over to the directors for production. This is another innovation by Horace G. Plimpton, manager of Edison negative production, and it will undoubtedly mark another step forward in the quality of Edison photoplays. Davies declares that the new work has opened his eyes to the amount of art and imagination required in the writing of a photoplay, and that his visits to the Edison studio convinced him that the production of a photoplay requires as much artistry and thought on the director's part as the staging of a three-act play.

He believes that successful photoplay authors may in time contribute to the stage itself, so that "in time the moving picture industry, by way of recompense to the regular theatres whose balconies and galleries it has so often left bare and deserted may give to the theatre a brand-new crop of budding and blossoming American dramatists."

We might inform Mr. Davies that at least a half dozen successful photoplaywrights have contributed to the stage during the past year. One scribe has sold a two-act libretto and others have contributed high-class vaudeville sketches. More are coming.

Foiling the Faker

The New York World has instituted a "fakers' bureau." In an attempt to curb the enthusiastic correspondent who steals his "stuff" and dresses it for the market under new garments, the World asks the co-operation of all staff men and special writers in clearing the columns of the newspapers from fakes and steals. One complaint means dismissal and the "black-list," providing investigation proves the complaint well founded. We believe the time is near when scenario editors will take like action.

Some Film Stories

James Oppenheim has started a serial, "Peg o' the Movies," in the Ladies' World. Oppenheim has written many photoplays.

Van Loan has resumed his Western Motion Pictures stories in the Saturday Evening Post.

Another "School" in Court

Following the raid by Federal officers on "The National Authors' Institute," another "Correspondence school" has been summoned to the United States bar. Hearings have been held before United States Commissioners in an effort to secure an indictment against a Chicago photoplay school. The Government alleges that the "school" falsely stated that it had influence with the motion picture companies which guaranteed the acceptance of the scripts written by its pupils. The attorneys seek to prove that this alleged statement induced many to part with their money for the course in the belief that they would be certain of that "fifty dollars weekly" after completion. A denial of all charges is made. Decision has been reserved. Uncle Sam has been getting busy recently regarding "photoplay schools," thanks to the crusade that has been waged for two years past. Other prosecutions are expected.

Editorial Statements

Universal editorial department announces that the company is always ready to purchase acceptable scripts and that within thirty days over $200 worth of "outside" work has been accepted.

The Eclair editorial department has received an avalanche of scripts since the Eclair editorial needs were given in this department. No scripts considered except from authors having three or more produced acceptances to their credit; nothing but typewritten scripts will be read; neither will scripts that do not contain stamps be read; checks will be mailed the very day the signed contract is received from the author. Successful authors might do well to chalk up Eclair for a first reading of any split-reel travesties; exceptional one-reel comedies, or two- or three-reel modern dramas, mostly indoor work requiring no costumes, which Eclair is about to launch.

Pertinent Pointers

Adaptations from standard literature are rarely desired by script editors. Blache Features, Fort Lee, N. J., is the one exception at present. They will read stirring adaptations from the classics for multiple reels.

When you conceive an idea let it "soak" in your brain. Do not rush off to the typewriter and dash off a plot which has not been carefully though out. Let that idea of yours germinate. Leave it alone and revolve its possibilities carefully in your brain. Think it out from all angles before writing your story.

New York Motion Picture Corporation is not buying any Civil War dramas at present. Puritan, Irish and straight dramatic stories will be given prompt consideration by Richard V. Spencer, editor. The Keystone Company, a branch concern, uses good good comedy of the rapid-fire variety. Synopsis are also considered. Address Editor Spencer, 1712 Allesandro street, Los Angeles, Cal.

"What am I going to do with it?" asked a beginner when he sent for our inspection a beautifully engrossed diploma issued by the "faculty" of a "school." This unfortunate is a "graduate." He will be obliged to forget much before his work will find a market. Burn the diploma and try and keep it secret from script editors that you ever took the "course." Bars are up against "school graduates" in these editorial departments: Selig, Universal, Lubin, Famous Players, Eclair and others.

An author informed us recently that a script she had submitted to aprominent concern was kept for consideration three months and then returned as unavailable. Recently editorial changes have been made, and she asked if she should take another chance with the same concern. We answered in the affirmative.

Marketing scripts is a game of chance in one sense. We sold one story twice to the same concern. A directo rliked the yarn, but he took another berth before he produced it. In the meantime we got a check. The next director didn't like the script. After six months the editor sent it back, saying we were entitled to the money, at that. We held the script another six months, submitted it again to the same concern with an account of its unusual history. Money must have been plentiful just then, because the script was taken and another check mailed. This occurs once in a lifetime, but it goes to show that the ways of the manuscript markets passeth understanding. A hundred things other than the worth of the script may interfere with its sale. All you know is that your work is returned.

Length of the Play

A gentleman in Wall Street (not Sampson Rock, either) writes photoplays and he wishes to know something about the approved length. He says most beginners have no idea where to stop on the average plot. Many have no idea where to stop, but more have no idea where to begin. Not more than half the photoplays submitted start where they should. Some start over toward the end and explain back by the "vision" and the "dream." Others start too soon and several hundred words are misused before entering upon the story proper. Tell your story straight from the shoulder. Begin at the proper beginning, when things happen, and end when the action ends. A photoplay story intended to run a thousand feet should rarely cover more than three or four sheets of 8½x11 paper, providing it is single spaced. This includes synopsis and cast of characters. Remember you are writing action, not dialogue or word pictures. The briefer and clearer you can depict that action, the better for all concerned. Do not become worried by the number of scenes you see in some picture plays in your favorite theatre. Because the Venus Motion Picture Company is "hooking up" plays to seventy-five half-second scenes to the thousand feet is no reason why you should endeavor to write seventy-five scenes into your script. This quick-action stuff is merely long scenes chopped into very short ones. If you can tell your story in twenty or twenty-five scenes and get it across, do so. What the director may do with your script after its purchase is his business. Give him good, clear action to work upon and there your responsibility ends. But few concerns use the flash-scene method.

The Hall of Fame

W. E. Wing, prolific writer of photoplays, was formerly a reporter on the Los Angeles Express.

Horace Vinton, former script editor for Comet, American, Shamrock, etc., is now director of production of "The Siege and Fall of the Alamo," Motion Picture Company, San Antonio, Tex.

Charles Van Loan, who has been writing stories of motion picture actors for the Saturday Evening Post, was once a baseball editor.

Frank E. Woods, well known throughout filmland as "The Spectator," has joined the Mutual Film Corporation. He will supervise all scenario work for the Majestic and Reliance companies.

Not a Remedy

The Film Man, of the Dramatic Mirror, prints an argument penned by Harry O. Hoyt that "more leaders is the remedy for the vague photoplay." Sub-titles may be abused and self-explanatory action can often supersede the sub-title. They take atmosphere from the play and interrupt convincing action. It is easy to stick in a sub-title; it is not so easy to so manipulate your action and characters that a sub-title is unnecessary. Along the line of least resistance will never win in photoplay writing. The Film Man, in commenting correctly, states:

"Authors are working along the correct line when attempting to make their work understandable with few leaders. Knowing the stories themselves they misjudge the normal capacity for grasping a situation hurriedly presented on the screen. Hence, both the explanatory action and its alternative, words that solve the riddle, are omitted at critical moments because the need is not appreciated. Let the author place himself in the position of the least enlightened of his spectators; then if a cloudy meaning cannot be cleared by action it is time to bring in sub-titles. Nothing is more disastrous than vagueness."

An Important School

If you wish to become a photoplay-writer or a writer of fiction and desire to attend school, let us here and now suggest that school. We shall suggest an institution that will pay you while you are learning—the Institution of Journalism. A script editor is quoted as follows: "Strange as it may seem, the best motion picture stories do not come from trained story-writers, although the majority of professional scenario authors come from the ranks of newspaperdom and the theatrical field." We know little about the theatrical field, but we claim to know something of the newspaper field, having been in the newspaper harness for sixteen years. This editor possibly does not mean just what he says. He is correct in his statement that many successful writers of motion picture stories come from the newspaper ranks, but the good newspaper man is also a trained story-writer. That is the reason the former newspaper men succeed as literary workers. They do not wait for inspiration—they work; they are familiar with the tools of their trade, that of writing; they know a story when they see one; they can daub on local color and characterize. Kipling, O. Henry, George Randolph Chester, David Graham Phillips and the rest of the star fiction-writers were once journalists. Giles R. Warren, C. B. Hoadley and many other stars of the photoplay-writing world smelled printers' ink many years ago. To the beginner we advise joining the staff of some good newspaper. Follow Mark Twain's rule and work without remuneration for a time until a place is made for you, or you make a place for yourself. Instead of paying out money to some "correspondence" school, enter the school of journalism, which is found with a live newspaper, and not in a college class-room, or by the postal route. You will learn to know life and, best of all, to write about life. Then, if you have it in you, the rest will follow naturally.

Looking Forward

Next week, Editor B. P. Schulberg, of the Famous Players Film Company, will tell our readers how he adapts famous plays into motion-picture stories. Worth looking forward to.

Collier's Weekly Awakens

We have heard from Collier's Weekly. The editor of that publication has awakened to the fact that most of these "Photoplaywright Correspondence Schools" are delusions and snares, and he asked us all about it. We replied. Like Micawber, we expect something to turn up.

ARTHUR JOHNSON, OF LUBIN, AS A COUNTRY BUMPKIN

FIRST KEYSTONE TWO-ACT COMEDY

"Zuzu, the Band Leader" Features Mabel Normand and Ford Sterling

WITH the motion picture "Zuzu, the Band Leader" the Keystone Company enters the field of two-part comedies. This is the first of the famous Keystone laugh-makers to appear in that length. Its success means much to the producers and will be watched with interest by other producers. So, on this single picture, rests considerable importance. This fact has spurred the Keystone producers on to do their best and the result is a two-reel comedy picture which is bound to set a new mark. It goes the whole length without a dull moment and has proved, by its reception, that motion picture patrons will welcome two-reel comedies even more enthusiastically as they have welcomed the one-reel comedies.

Ford Sterling and Mabel Normand, those two inimitable comedians, with their numerous fellow players are likely to cause many a stitch in the side when this picture is shown. It is by far the best that they have produced in a very long time in point of humor. Even the staid censorship board and the apathetic press were mighty interested when the picture was shown at a private exhibition. And it might be added that all felt in a better humor after.

Any one who is acquainted with the work of these two stars, and "anyone" means everyone, can well imagine what two thousand feet of it must be like.

It is not necessary for Sterling to have a story. He is the story by himself. But the addition of a corking good comedy does not detract from his work or its effect.

So agreeable and profitable has been the work of the Keystone Company aided and abetted by the two mentioned and Mack Sennett, that their work has been copiously copied by several other companies.

This picture was produced under the personal direction of Mack Sennett, the Keystone magazine director.

In Los Angeles the Keystone people may have the city hall if they require it, so popular are they. Many times have they called out the fire department or needing assistance the regular police department have aided them with a few "comedians."

This first two-reeler is to be supplemented by a number of others all of which will be released as "specials," the booking of which will be done through the Mutual exchanges.

THE GIRLS FLOCK AROUND ZUZU

IN ALL HIS GLORY

ROYAL FILM EXCHANGE BUSY

The Royal Film Exchange, of 286 Market street, Newark, which distributes the Universal program in New Jersey, has sold to the Bergen Theatre, at Bergen and Springfield avenues, Newark, an automatic ticket machine of the latest design. They have also furnished the City Theatre, at Springfield and Twenty-first streets, Newark, with a mirroroide curtain, 850 opera chairs, an automatic ticket machine, and two Powers 6A projection machines.

Lorimer Johnston, one of the directors of the American Film Manufacturing Company at the Santa Barbara, Cal., studios, has just started a three-reel feature production.

The story is laid in America, and embraces the periods of 1860, 1880, 1900 and 1913. The parts are all played by the same people. The picture starts in 1900 and goes back to 1860, showing the cast in their younger days, and then bringing all the characters up to the present day.

SCENES FROM "THE SILENCE OF THE DEAD"
Gaumont four-reel subject.

MUCH has been said under this heading and much more is to be said as long as many persons and managers are working their brains to find something new to catch the attention of the theatregoers.

Motion pictures are not a necessity; motion pictures are a luxury.

In any town of the United States, the butchers, bakers and grocers do not spend as much money in a show-window and are not as courteous, because we need their goods for our daily wants, as the jeweler, the art store man and the fancy goods dealer. These men are far more courteous and spend much more money on their show-windows, because they deal in goods that are not a necessity but a luxury. Consequently they must tempt the patrons.

Ugly Posters Do Not Make For Success

Motion pictures are not only a luxury but there is much competition. Consequently it is not the man that spends the most money in defacing the exterior of his theatre with ugly posters and dirty banners that will win. Success will come to the man who conducts a refined show and who knows how to make a name for himself and for his theatre.

I was led to write these lines after my visit at the Regent theatre of New York, as the great success of S. L. Rothapfel is a real lesson.

Mr. Rothapfel does not need to have ugly, dirty, ragged banners stretched over the entrance of the beautiful Regent theatre, nor does he need for numerous posters to deface the sidewalk and lobby. No. He does not need to spend money in this direction because his patrons come directly to his theatre without stopping to look at the posters. They leave the train at the subway station and shoot for the Regent. They come on street cars, in carriages, in automobiles or on foot and all, without exception, enter the lobby, purchase their tickets and walk in, without stopping to look at the very few posters.

There is a reason. Mr. Rothapfel made a name and a reputation for the Regent in less than a month. Such a reputation that persons from Brooklyn and other distant points, travel the long distance to St. Nicholas avenue to enjoy a real motion picture show. Everyone knows that Mr. Rothapfel does not only show the best pictures, but he is the master in the art of projecting them and of adapting the proper music. This is not all. Mr. Rothapfel has made of the Regent theatre a most comfortable rendezvous for the lovers of moton pictures and his attendants are extremely courteous.

Rothapfel's Success a Lesson

The success of Mr. Rothapfel knocks to pieces the argument of certain exhibitors who claim that a show must be advertised with an overdose of ugly and sensational posters.

My advice is: "Deliver the goods and you will succeed."

An exhibitor from a small town of 6,000 inhabitants called on me for an advice. He charges an admission of ten cents and has one competitor. He claims that he is making no money. I investigated the case and found that he made no money because he did not deliver the goods.

He shows six reels for ten cents or thirty-six reels per week and he pays $30 for such a service. Anyone will know that you cannot get thirty-six decent reels for $30. They must be very old, full of rain storms and scratches. No one wants to pay ten cents to see such a bunch of old junk, but they wait to go to the next town to visit a motion picture theatre.

This exhibitor is a great believer in advertising schemes, he makes an abuse of posters, has a weekly "County Fair Store," souvenirs, and so on.

My advice to this man is: Use the $6 you spend weekly for cheap groceries for your county fair store to hire a decent, clean and courteous young man to act as the usher. Transfer to your film service all the money you spend foolishly on posters, handbills, souvenirs and other such advertising schemes and you will increase your receipts.

Quality Before Quantity

With a four-hundred-seat house, two shows per evening at a ten-cent scale, he should have a daily patronage of 500 persons or $50. This would give him for the six days of the week, something like $300, and with such receipts, you should be able to pay no less than $90 for your six reels. I would even advise cutting the show down to four reels or twenty-four reels per week for the same price of $90. The public does not call for long programmes. They prefer the quality to the quantity and when they will find that you give them, in their own town, a show equal to what they can see in other towns, they will patronize your theatre.

You can bluff the public once in a while and then to just a certain limit.

The same rules apply to other industries. Some manufacturers are making no headway; they are wasting their time and energy and the patience of their creditors in futile advertising schemes to force their goods on the market. Evidently they make some sales. This is their misfortune because these sales keep them alive, keep them hoping against hope, keep them in a constant state of agony, until the day comes when the creditors refuse to give more time and force the manufacturer to the wall. Why? Because the manufacturer does not deliver the goods. He is a shrewd advertiser. His clever advertisements catch a few customers daily, but his goods make him no name, no reputation.

Build For To-morrow

Other manufacturers are making fortunes because they deliver the goods. Their advertisements sold them their first goods and as the goods gave satisfaction, the first customers made new ones.

Do not be so foolish as to believe that you must not consider to-morrow. Such a poor policy may hold good in a locality with a continuous transient trade, but will prove the ruin of the manager who has to depend on a purely local patronage. You must build your trade for to-morrow and not for to-day. If you have to lose something on your show to-day, be cheerful, pocket the loss and when your patrons will realize that your policy is to give them a good, clean show, they will reward you with a daily patronage and in the future you will reap a harvest.

Motion Picture Theatre Construction Department

WHEN, in a previous issue, I discussed the too free use of ginger-bread decorations, especially for the exterior work, as being too easy nests for the dirt flying from the street, some decorators had an idea that I was opposed to plastic ornaments.

I am far from injuring the business of the decorators, as if the exhibitors want to follow the advice given them in these articles, they will build more artistic theatres and the decorators themselves will find more profit, supplying higher class work than a lot of cheap stuff, made by the yard, if I may use such an expression.

The accompanying illustration of the Orpheum theatre of Indianapolis, Ind., is a good example.

This facade has not the amount of cheap ginger-bread decoration making the average photoplay house hideous, but if the quantity is small the quality is far above the general run and the exterior of a four-story building, covered with cheap plastic ornaments, would not pay the decorating bill of the Orpheum theatre. There is more money for the decorators in the heavy cornices of the Orpheum, in the capitals and bases of the columns, in the figures of the arch and in the figures standing between the columns, than there would be if the building was covered with what is generally termed "ginger-bread decorations."

If the columns, the cornices and the figures gather the dirt of the street they are not such bad dust nests as the small plastic relief ornaments, and if even they gather the dirt, they can be more easily cleaned as they offer larger surfaces and not a multitude of small delicate ornaments to break like glass under the brush of the cleaner.

A theatre like the Orpheum is costly, but cheaper in the long run than a theatre that has to be retouched every few months, and is a far better investment, as it improves the neighborhood and is attractive.

In many cases of fire, any loss of life is due, primarily, to the fact that the exit doors cannot be opened at the crucial moment. The terrified people pile themselves in heaps about the exits and the poor unfortunates are trampled to death before the flames even reach them.

Concerning Exit Doors

Exit doors have been a matter of constant difficulties with the fire departments. To leave the doors unfastened and unguarded, is to give a chance to some bad boys to enter the place without paying the admission.

Several devices have been placed on the market and have been highly praised. While these various devices stood the test, they have proven, like many other devices, inadequate in case of an emergency. In case of a fire the panic-stricken folks jam against the door and as they do not know of the levers or do not know how to work them, they are in the way of the attendants, who when they arrive cannot come close enough to the doors to work the levers.

I have been caught in such a panic and unable to get to the doors unless brute force was used to get through the crowd.

It was a panic without real cause. The current was furnished by a trolley line; they had an accident on the road and the lights went out. As the house was in total darkness the weak ones began to feel uneasy. As the lights did not return at once, children began to cry, women to scream and a general panic started.

THE ORPHEUM THEATRE, INDIANAPOLIS, IND.

The recurrence of such disasters is rendered absolutely impossible by the operation of the "Von Duprin Self-Releasing Fire Exit Latch." This device takes advantage of the inevitable rush of the panic-stricken crowd, and uses it as the natural means of throwing open the way to escape and safety. A child has the same advantage as a man, no real power required, a mere touch does the work.

The main features of the Von Duprin Device are as follows: It combines into one the usual features of all locking devices, the lock and the top and bottom latches.

Works in Real Panic

On the inside, about waist high, a solid bar stretches across the door. The bar stands way from the wood and connects directly with the mechanism of the latch. Any pressure applied to any part of the bar, instantly and positively releases lock and latches simultaneously.

The operation of the Von Duprin Device under actual conditions of a panic is self-evident. The people rush blindly toward the exit doors, the leaders are forced against the bars across the doors, and the said bars under the pressure of the crowd give in, releasing the latches and throwing the doors open.

The bar extends across the full width of the door; it is not a device that one has to hunt for, nor a device requiring any special manipulation. A mere child running against the door, will throw open same with no other effort than to press the bar with his little hand or part of his frail body.

As the door cannot be opened from the exterior without a key, there is no danger for any one to enter the auditorium through the exit doors, to evade paying admission.

While in Cleveland my attention was called to the Artstone as a building material offering some advantages to the builder of a motion picture theatre, wishing to erect a lasting building.

Artstone is a manufactured stone composed of the best weather-impervious materials, put together under strong pressure and left to harden under natural conditions. It is a stone which will stand the test of time and weather and upon which fire has but little effect.

Concrete Superior to Stone

As to durability, the manufacturers of Artstone can show a building erected in the year 1874, in which the Artstone trimmings, after an exposure of nearly forty years to all sorts of weather, have been found in perfect condition.

This proof of durability should not surprise us, as the buildings of the ancients fully demonstrate the superiority of concrete over natural stone for lasting qualities. Concrete stone, which was used in their buildings in connection with natural stone, is to-day in an excellent state of preservation.

The uses and necessities of concrete have been thoroughly demonstrated in the building work, and the rapidly increasing demand for this class of material shows that what was formerly considered an experiment and heartily condemned by those less progressive promises to be the greatest factor in building construction for the coming decade.

With Artstone on the market, a material of real merit, equal in every way to the natural stone, why pay the high price of cut stone work? Artstone fills a much needed want, saving fully from 30 to 50 per cent of the actual cost of natural cut stone.

As Artstone will not absorb the rain and dirt, the ornaments and the trimmings will remain clean and not require a new coat of paint every season,

Nicholas Power as a Seer

NICHOLAS POWER, president of the company which bears his name and manufactures projection machines, has this to say on the future of the motion picture:

"Without a doubt the motion picture business has developed more rapidly within a given period of time than any other industry. To-day, in Greater New York we have over 1200 picture houses, while in the United States there are about 15,000.

"The one feature that assures a future for the motion picture is their versatility, as there is hardly a line of endeavor in which they have not become a factor. One may well wonder what becomes of the vast number of motion picture machines which constitute our daily output, and yet if you consider the many fields in which this industry has become a part, it ceases to be a mystery.

"Our Cameragraph No. 6A is used by nearly all the prominent lecturers, churches, schools, Y. M. C. A.'s and other religious institutions, in commercial houses and factories, where they are used to exploit their wares, as well as surgical operations, and all branches of the arts, etc.

"These requirements are enormous, and the vast resources of our factory are working hard to keep up with the demands.

"Their value as an exponent of education is already recognized, and I thoroughly believe that time itself is bound to render the motion picture more and more indispensable."

AMERICAN ENGAGES CONSULTING DIRECTOR

Alix F. Harmer has been engaged by S. S. Hutchinson, president of the American Film Manufacturing Company, as consulting director.

Mr. Harmer has had an extended experience and is an authority on stage settings and costumings. He has already taken up his duties at the new Santa Barbara studios, where all facilities for the carrying out of the minutest details are available and where projects of greatest magnitude can be skillfully and expeditiously handled.

LEHIGH ORPHEUM REOPENED

The Third Street Theatre Company, of Easton, Pa., on Saturday, November 15, re-opened the Lehigh Orpheum at South Bethlehem, Pa. This company now operates three fine theatres with a seating capacity of 500, 750 and 800, respectively. In all three theatres the rate is five cents at the matinees and ten cents in the evenings. A program is shown, consisting of five new reels of General Film subjects and one big feature a week.

Music and the Picture

Suggestions Invited, Questions Cheerfully Answered

Address: Music Department, The Motion Picture News

ON last Sunday evening I visited the "Circle Theatre" on Broadway, New York.

While my desire was to see some first run pictures, I was treated to a real concert. The Ladies' Symphony Orchestra had an exceedingly well-prepared and executed programme of some of the best-known selections. It was a treat.

I am sorry to state that the orchestra did not receive the encouragement due to its efforts, in fact the audience was very cool, too cold. Twice only were the musicians applauded and it was a very mild mark of appreciation. It was more the applause of a few friends of the musicians wishing to enthuse the audience, but who quickly desisted when they found no response to their enthusiasm.

Concert With Pictures on the Side

The fault was not on the part of the orchestra but on the management, who after arranging a Sunday musical programme, offered five reels, each one with shooting and killings.

The two-reel feature of Essanay: "The Brand of Evil" has its merits, but the music was not in accord with the production.

"The Blight" of Pathe which ended with a suicide, did not harmonize with the musical selections.

There was too much Western and Indian fun in the production "A Sense of Humor" of Edison, to fit the music.

I say fit the music because at the Circle and other theatres where they advertise a special orchestra, they do not fit the music to the picture, but expect the pictures to fit the music. In other words, the managers give a concert with pictures on the side.

Mr. Yerkes, of sound effect fame, is introducing a new musical and decorative novelty, for either a stage setting or a lobby display.

It is an electric rainbow fountain of very simple construction requiring no special connections and practically no attention. Five gallons of water, kept in circulation by an electric pump, are forced into a vaporized spray through the glass bowl, and then drained into a metal tank below.

An automatic projector renders it possible to produce weird changes and blending of colors every few seconds.

The base is octagonal in form and cast in bronze or any other material. The eight panels are surmounted with artistic jardinieres for growing plants, ferns or cut flowers.

Mr. Yerkes has arranged a set of his famous electric bells and chimes on the eight panels of the base, hidden by the foliage of the plants. The effect is charming and while the patrons admire the spray in its constant changing of colors, they hear the music of the chimes.

I realize that few musicians can play the picture at the Regent because it takes a well-trained mind and a perfect knowledge of music, to distinguish all the points, especially in a picture treating with a foreign subject like the "Last Days of Pompeii." But if it is not given to all musicians to be a master of the art like Mr. Rothapfel, the manager, most of them should have enough common sense to not butcher a fine drama and not overlook a film offering them good opportunities to work some appropriate music.

I refer to the "Veteran" of the Broncho Company. I have seen the film twice and at both exhibitions I found the music out of place.

The first scenes are very pathetic with the veteran, minus his pension and an invalid wife on his charge. There is love and mutual sacrifice in this old couple.

When the old veteran is at the banquet, there are some splendid opportunities for appropriate music. A military charge, a battle scene with much firing of guns, then some deep sentimental notes, when the comrade, who is the speaker and who has just related the war exploits of years gone by, pins on the coat of the veteran a medal of honor. This banquet scene closes with a general cheering for the old veteran.

The old veteran returns home, full splendidly acted but which lost much of its beauty by not being interpreted correctly by the musicians, is the death scene.

What Music Can Do

The most pathetic scene, which is of joy, as during the banquet he has been able to hide under his coat some food for his poor starving wife. When he enters his room, the wife is dead in her rolling-chair, but the veteran, believing that she is asleep, starts, with the least noise possible, to prepare the table so as to surprise his wife with a good, substantial meal.

When everything is ready, the veteran tries to wake up his wife. She is dead.

At the same moment, his comrades arrive in front of the house with a brass band and they start to serenade the veteran.

The leader enters the room full of joy, followed by the strains of the brass band, to find himself in the house of sorrow.

It is certainly a very pathetic scene and a scene that would have brought tears to many eyes if the musicians had known to emphasize these different contrasts of sorrow and joy, instead of dulling the whole action of the picture with an inappropriate, monotonous tune.

I do not wish to criticise the merits

Address: Exhibitors' Department, The Motion Picture News

IN the advertising department I say that the best way to advertise the picture is to give a good show, to deliver the goods and not to try to make money on ugly and sensational posters.

Appearance and manners also have much to do with the success of a motion picture theatre.

The clothes do not make the man. A neat uniform on the back of a clean-cut fellow can improve his appearance and good manners, while the finest uniform on the back of a hoodlum will not convey the desired impression. Some men look neat in even an old suit of clothes, while some men will always look unkempt in the best clothes.

While the uniform can improve the general appearance, it is not absolutely necessary.

Uniform a Badge of Authority

The uniform does not teach manners. A man can be polite and courteous in his plain street clothes. The only real quality of the uniform is to make the attendant more conspicuous in case a patron wants something. It is true that the uniform imparts a sort of authority to the wearer and is a mark of refinement to a theatre.

Uniform or no uniform, the manager must see that he has the proper kind of help, as the doorman, the ticket seller and the ushers can make the success or the failure of the theatre.

The main trouble with many managers is that they do not want to pay living wages. They have an idea that there is no work of importance in the taking of tickets or the showing of seats. The managers who want cheap ushers cannot give the proper service.

I visited a leading theatre on Broadway, charging 10c and 15c admission. As I could find no seat on the main floor, I went to the balcony to find same as crowded as the lower floor. I had to stand for a whole picture.

Patrons continued to arrive, they walked up and down the aisles trying to find some seats, but as none were vacant, they had to return to the standing room.

This constant stream of persons going down and up the aisles, hunting for seats, was very annoying to the audience and many patrons complained that they could not follow the picture.

Yes, the management had some ushers, but what ushers? Men of no experience, who remained standing or leaning on the back of the last row of chairs, who paid no attention to the visitors and who did not try to keep order.

If these ushers had known their business they would have placed themselves at the head of the aisles and would have asked the newcomers to wait, as there were no vacant seats. By so doing they would have averted this constant stream of seat-hunters going down and up the aisles and would have made the place more tolerable to the audience in general.

Work Hard for Girls

The only work these ushers attempted to do was to see that no one would occupy the two first rows of chairs (reserved boxes) without an extra ticket, and this very simple work they did not seem able to perform correctly. They allowed any one to go down the aisle, seat themselves, then one of the ushers would go down the aisle to ask for the extra tickets, and, as in most cases the persons had no reserved seats, they had to walk up the aisle for the standing room. Now, if the ushers had asked to see the tickets before the visitors would go down the aisle he would have spared much trouble to the visitors and to himself, and he would have spared the nerves of the audience.

Only a few days ago a manager told me of his troubles with his attendants, and informed me that he would have girls in the future, as he believes them to be more reliable than men.

I do not believe in girls as ushers and doormen, as it is asking too much from them to not only stand twelve hours on their feet, but to expect them to walk down and up the aisles so many times a day to show seats.

I fully agree with this manager that girls are more reliable and less rude when you cannot employ men other than the down and out class, who are willing to work at low wages until they can find something better to do. On the other hand, if the manager wishes to pay decent wages, he can secure clean-cut young men, who will prove more reliable than girls, in my opinion.

It is a very serious question, to which the best managers are paying much attention. I have been surprised during my last Western trip to see the great increase in men cashiers. The managers who employ young men as cashiers know the weakness of women for brass buttons.

Eichenlaub and Hood Go East

E. J. Eichenlaub and H. H. Hood of the America's Feature Film Company left for New York City last Saturday to close a deal with an Eastern syndicate on the purchase of the Mexican war picture which they issued under the name of Barbarous Mexico. These pictures were taken in the heart of this turbulent country during some of the battles which were fought there and show a few of the actual encounters, besides much of the interesting life in that country.

Operators' Ball December 10

The Chicago union of the Motion Picture Machine Operators will give its annual ball on Wednesday, December 10, at the Coliseum. It is expected that this year's affair will outclass anything ever before attempted by this body in Chicago. The arrangement committee has prepared many novel surprises and innovations which it is expected will place this event far above their previous efforts. They are using every available means to give this ball publicity and state that they are already assured a larger attendance than they ever before enjoyed.

An invitation has been extended to all the Chicago motion picture manufacturers and the acting companies. It is expected that many of the local photoplayers will be present. In anticipation of this the committee is putting out a card which reads as follows: "Meet your favorite motion picture Actor at the Ball." Electrical effects will be used, throwing different colors over the throngs at intervals.

William F. Canavan, third international vice-president of the I. A. T. S. E. and his wife have been invited to attend and lead the grand march. The ball will commence at eight o'clock.

The arrangement committee consists of Hal Johnstone, president; Morey Cohen, secretary; E. D. (Jack) Miller, Lee A. Forbes, H. H. Goldberg, Frank Hassett, Will Hassett, Bobby Burns, Bob Connelly, Al Strange and Ed Halliday.

Ventilation Injunction Hearing Continued

All the testimony of the defendant in the case of the closing of Mr. Whalen's theatre, the Washington, located in Cottage Grove avenue near Forty-third street on account of not complying with the ventilation ordinance, has been taken. Such experts as Mr. Weinshank of Indianapolis, Mr. McCormack of the Armour Institute and Mr. Price, connected with the State Health and Safety Department, testified in favor of Mr. Whalen. The case will be brought up again and the city will present its testimony.

In the meantime no action is being taken by the aldermen in connection with modifying the ordinance as they feel that any decision on their part would affect the case one way or the other.

Mutual vs. Ohio Censorship

Henry S. Toner, attorney for the motion picture interests of Chicago, who are preparing to fight for what they term a more just censorship, gives the following interview on the case which was heard in Cleveland, Ohio, on Saturday, November 28 of the Mutual Film Corporation against the State of Ohio.

"Ohio has provided for a board of censors, the function of which is to pass upon the availability, modesty and respectability of motion picture films exhibited in that state. The law provides that before a film can be exhibited it must be passed upon by this board of censors, and a fee of $1.00 for each film or each copy of an original film must be paid into the state treasury. This board of censors was appointed some time in the spring of this year, since which time they passed upon something like 15,000 films.

"Some time ago the Mutual Film Corporation, a Virginia corporation, filed a bill in the U. S. court to enjoin the board of censors from performing their statute duties. This bill set forth that the Ohio statute was a violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Federal Constitution, and that it also is a violation of the constitutional provision guaranteeing the right of freedom of speech and freedom of the press. The bill also alleged that the act was in violation of the Ohio constitution. The bill further averred that the Ohio statute ran contrary to the Interstate Commerce clause of the Federal Constitution.

The hearing on Saturday, November 29 was had before a full bench of federal judges. Circuit Judge Warrington of Cincinnati, and District Judges Day and Killets sat on it. For the purpose of hearing the argument on motion for a temporary injunction, the Mutual Film Corporation was represented by their general counsel, Mr. Seligsberg, of New York City and by Squire Sanders and Dempsey, one of the leading legal firms of Cleveland, Ohio. Arguments were made by Mr. Clark, Mr. Seligsberg and Judge Sanders on behalf of the Mutual Film Corporation, and by Mr. Morgan, assistant to the attorney general of the state of Ohio on behalf of the attorney general.

"At the conclusion of the hearing the court entered a restraining order as prayed for in the bill. This order restrained the state board of censorship from in any way interfering with the distribution of the films of the Mutual Film Corporation until final hearing of the case."

Mr. Toner's purpose of visiting Cleveland to hear the arguments in this case was for informative purposes. Should the Mutual win out in their fight it would affect the censorship of the whole country and at the present time the motion-picture interests of Chicago are preparing to secure what they term more just and sane censorship of the motion picture.

Mr. Toner is delving deep into the subject of censorship and has gathered much valuable material and other data which will materially affect the case. What method of procedure will be used or when the first steps will be taken, has not been decided. However, the various interests have already contributed a considerable amount of money.

"Simplex" Enlarges Its Factory

THE Precision Machine Co., has greatly increased its factory facilities in its present location at No. 317 East Thirty-fourth street, New York City, by taking over two additional floors and thereby adding about 16,000 square feet floor space to its quarters.

The top floor is utilized for the assembling department and the general offices, where all is light and comfortable.

The steady increase in demand for Simplex projectors has made this addition imperative.

KLEINE'S "POMPEII" MUSIC POPULAR

One of the many innovations used in advertising George Kleine's "The Last Days of Pompeii," was an especially written 50-page book of music composed by the famous music writer, Palmer Clark, and furnished to orchestra leaders in the various theatres where "Pompeii" was projected. This innovation proved more popular than was expected, and the Chicago and New York offices of George Kleine are in receipt of many requests from theatre musicians for copies of the score, as well as many music lovers who heard the music. Owing to the limited number of lithographed copies made, it has been impossible to answer these requests. Arrangements have been made, however, on future big subjects to print a larger supply, which will be sent to the general public at actual manufacturing and postage cost.

SAVED BY A MISS

Ormi Hawley, of the Lubin Stock Company, recently had a truly remarkable escape from death. She was due to appear in a Lubin drama. In order to fulfill the engagement she had decided to catch a certain train. Owing to the number of unforeseen circumstances, however, she only arrived at the station in time to see her train leave the station, disappearing around a bend in the railway.

She was very much upset, as this meant that she could not possibly reach the appointed place in time for the scene, but her dismay was converted into most devout gratitude a few hours later, when news arrived to the effect that the train which she had missed had been wrecked on its journey, many of the passengers being either killed or seriously injured.

JOIN FAMOUS PLAYERS

The Famous Players Film Company has added three new members to its producing staff. They are Hugh Ford, Frederick Stanhope and Edward S. Morange, all of whom have long been associated in the production of many artistic successes of the stage. Among these have been "The Garden of Allah," "The Blue Bird" and "The Melting Pot."

Mr. Ford, who is an authority on dramatic construction, will serve the Famous Players in the field where he has made his reputation—as a producer. Mr. Stanhope, through his familiarity with the customs, costumes and manners of all periods and his knowledge of stage-craft, will devote his talents to this branch of the business, while Mr. Morange, a recognized authority on scenic art, will concern himself with the architectural and decorative effects of the productions.

FIELDING'S EPICUREAN STEED

"Like master, like servant," is an old and familiar proverb. "Like rider, like horse," however, is not so old, and yet, according to Romaine Fielding, of the Lubin Las Vegas, New Mexico, studio, of which he is director, author, manager and leading man, is just as true He points to his pet horse, Dodger, and to himself as illustrating the new adage.

Fielding has taught Dodger a number of expensive habits. He finds himself obliged to supply him with chicken, ham, cheese sandwiches, and pickles and cakes, for Dodger could just as well live off a dairy lunch counter as in a stable on timothy and oats. Incidentally Dodger prefers his sandwiches well buttered and spread with mustard, and plenty of sugar in his tea and coffee—all of which goes to bear out Fielding's adage that a horse becomes like a man who rides him, as in his own case.

EDGAR JONES

Edgar Jones, director and leading man of the Lubin stock company, now stationed at Betzwood, Pa., was born in Steubenville, Ohio. After spending a few years of his youth in the picture frame business he adopted the stage and with Edgar Selwyn joined the Kyrle Bellew Co. in "A Gentleman of France" under the management of Liebler & Co., under the training of Selwyn and Oscar Eagle. Jones became a proficient stage director and actor.

Desiring broad experience he joined two or three stock companies and again was a member of the Viola Allen Co. After leaving the Liebler Co. engagements and offer was made by Lubin, which was accepted and as Mr. Jones is doing excellent work he will doubtless remain in the photo drama work for many years.

"THE DEVIL WITHIN"

Ramo

"THE Devil Within," the latest product of the Ramo Company, is a story in three reels that will please. It is a combination of mild melodrama tinged with romance, which is so well staged and effectively acted, that it can hardly fail to prove popular. Photographically, the production is of the first rank, the clarity and distinctness of the scenes being unusually superior in character. It will be released December 10.

"LEAD US NOT INTO TEMPTATION"

The play, which was produced under the direction of William Davis, centers about the misfortunes of Jack Walker, a college man and football star, whose brother-in-law, James Gleason, by his machinations, succeeds in discrediting him, and in having him cut off in his father's will. By the aid of a woman, a friend of Gleason's, Jack is charged with theft and is compelled to leave college.

Soon afterward Jack's father dies, and in an effort to see him, he once more falls under Gleason's baneful influence, who charges him with attempted burglary, thus cutting him off from ever sharing in his father's estate. Jack escapes, and becoming hungry and desperate attempts to enter a farmhouse. He is only saved from this crime by overhearing a prayer of the farmer's daughter, Edith. In leaving he is injured, and is taken in and cared for by the farmer's family. Later Jack and Edith grow to love each other.

Meanwhile Gleason, whose wife has come into the fortune rightfully Jack's, has renewed his acquaintance with the woman who effected Jack's downfall. A thief enters her apartment and accidentally kills her. All the evidence points to Gleason as her murderer as the thief succeeds in making good his escape.

Gleason flees, pursued by the police. He hides himself in a barn, to which later comes Jack, Edith, and a party of merrymakers on a straw ride. Discovered by Jack, Gleason threatens him with exposure of his past unless he aids him. In consequence Jack sends the detectives on a false scent when they arrive.

THE conclusion of the production shows Gleason trapped in the barn, which has caught fire from a carelessly thrown cigarette. He is rescued by Jack, at the risk of his life, and, dying, makes a confession which completely clears his rescuer.

A reproduction of a bona-fide college football game and the fire scene are two of the screen portrayals in "The Devil Within," which deserves special mention.

Jack Hopkins did excellent work as Jack Walker, the football hero and disinherited son, and Stuart Holmes, as the scheming brother-in-law, filled his part in a fashion which could hardly be excelled. Others in the cast were: Olga Troska, as Maude Barnes, the woman in league with Gleason; Lois Howard, as Edith; Jane Fisher, as the wife of Gleason; and John Travis, as John Walker, the father.

"THE GUERRILLAS OF ALGIERS"

Features Ideal

THE intention of Features Ideal, as piloted by Mrs. Agnes Egan Cobb, is to place two films a month on the market and make them the most unusual two that can be found. "The Guerrillas of Algiers" or "The Mosque in the Desert," a three-part production released December 5, gives great promise for those that are to follow. It contains corking good battle scenes, an excellent story, fine acting and good photography.

Most of the action is laid in the sands of the Sahara desert in Algeria during the Napoleonic wars that devastated that whole region. Phillippe, a youthful soldier of France, is apprised by his father in Algiers of the probability of their never meeting again. The older man has been sent by his general to negotiate with an Arab chief, in an attempt to bring about an armistice. A year following the letter, as nothing has been heard from his parent, the boy sets out on the quest of the family fortune, as he had been directed.

Arriving in Algiers, he overhears a plot which he knows is connected with his father, whom he believes living. Together with a friend he captures one of the conspirators, who turns out to be the chief his father had been sent to see. The Arab escapes and the boy follows. He is chased by the Arabs under the chief in the desert, and goes to a mosque for aid. The priest there recognizes him and tells him that the interior of the mosque contains the money which is the property of his family, because of services rendered by an ancestor to the Arabs. He finds his father and marries the girl.

There are some very excellent battle scenes in the picture, all of them true to history. They depict the methods Napoleon used in forming squares when opposed by a larger force. The photography and acting leave nothing to be desired.

Army-Navy Game Pictures a Success

THE Commercial Motion Pictures Company, Inc., of 102 West One Hundred and First street, New York City, succeeded in obtaining good motion pictures of the recent Army and Navy football game. Close views were secured of President Wilson, Secretary of War Garrison, Secretary of the Navy Daniels, Governor Glynn, of New York, and many others.

By means of telephoto lenses every exciting play was recorded, as if the figures were within twenty feet of the camera and in many instances the pictures as shown on the screen are even more tense with interest than in the real game. The Commercial also secured some exceptionally fine pictures of the Army maneuvers and Navy drills.

Although it was so dark after the last play of the game that ordinary photographers closed their cameras, finding it impossible to take views of the Serpentine dance, flag-rush and other events held by the jubilant cadets, the Commercial was enabled to obtain remarkably clear pictures of all these.

As a result of this, the Palace Theatre in New York has booked the pictures for the entire week, while William Morris' New York Theatre is also booking them.

It is planned to place the pictures on practically every battleship or large steamer that is equipped with a projecting machine, as they will prove of interest for a long time to come.

Universal Opens Own London Offices

THE Trans-Atlantic Film Company, which will handle the productions of the Universal in Great Britain, has just opened offices in the Universal House, Nos. 37-39 Oxford street, London. Owing to the fact that a former company had a charter in Great Britain under the name "Universal," it was found impractical to make use of that widely known trade-mark on the other side, hence it was deemed advisable to adopt the present name of the concern, which in future will transact the British business of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

In the newly opened offices of the Trans-Atlantic Film Company, which are among the most spacious of the kind in London, every facility is extended to patrons for the speedy and comfortable transaction of business.

The formal opening of the offices, which are located in the heart of one of the most important business centers in London, occurred recently. A large reception was given to representatives of the press from all parts of Great Britain. About fifty of the most important papers sent representatives, who were entertained by John D. Tippett, managing director of the new company, and the members of his staff, including John Avery, the London manager; Joseph Brandt, chief publicity manager; J. M. Downie, Lewis Rosch, J. E. Bryde-Hughes A. Henderson and several others.

The press-men were entertained in the well-appointed theatre which is part of the spacious entourage now occupied by the Trans-Atlantic Film Company, after which they were given a dinner in one of the leading London restaurants.

The "Trans-Atlantic Review" which will contain the future announcements of the Universal in Great Britain, is already being published by the Trans-Atlantic Company. This is the British edition of the Universal Weekly.

FIRST VIEW OF MOTION PICTURES

Four of the Mission Fathers from the old Santa Barbara Mission recently were the guests of President S. S. Hutchinson, of the American Film Manufacturing Company at Santa Barbara, Cal. The reverend gentlemen were taken through the extensive grounds and plant.

They were shown a print of "The Trail of the Lost Chord," the settings of which were largely taken on the sacred grounds of the mission. The production proved to be the first moving picture ever witnessed by them. Special permission had been granted the company to use the grounds.

SOME ODD USERS OF MOTION PICTURES

Motion picture outfits have been leaving the offices of the Kleine Optical Company with great rapidity of late, some of them headed for very odd destinations.

Among recent purchasers have been the Second Presbyterian Church of Massillon, Ohio; New England Congregational Church of Aurora, Illinois; the Aurora Y. M. C. A.; the Royal Tailors of Chicago, and the Copper-Queen Consolidated Mining Company of Bisbee, Arizona.

The latter is buying an outfit to keep its employees in the Mojave Desert contented.

BROOKLYN EXHIBITORS MEET

A meeting of the East New York branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Greater New York, was held Monday evening, at the Saratoga Theatre, with William Hollander in the chair. This meeting was attended by about fifty-two exhibitors in the surrounding territory. Reports of committees were read and the ball committee assisting Mr. Coleman made an encouraging report.

A committee was appointed to devise ways and means of putting a stop to the "country stores" in picture theatres, also to see that children over five years of age, accompanied by parents, are paid for.

A large attendance of Brooklyn exhibitors is expected at the ball to be given by the New York Exhibitors on December 15, in Terrace Garden.

The next meeting of the East New York branch will be held Monday night at the Ronley Theatre, 1980 Fulton street, Brooklyn.

WOMAN SENATOR IN "OUR MUTUAL GIRL"

Mrs. Helen Robinson, of Colorado, the only woman senator in the United States, made a short visit to New York last week. The Mutual Film Corporation learned of her presence, and, for the first time in her busy career, she was induced to appear in moving pictures together with her friend, Mrs. Edith Jarmouth, another Colorado suffragist, and two actresses, Norma Phillips and Mayme Kelso.

The pictures were taken on the beautiful Morosini estate for "Our Mutual Girl" series.

CLEVELAND CIRCUIT VAUDEVILLE EXCHANGE BOOMING

Talk about a busy vaudeville agency! Things are busy about the Cleveland-Fidelity Booking Service offices. This is an independent concern whose books show eleven tabloid musical comedy companies, five repertoire stock dramatic companies, three concert bands, two minstrel companies, two trained animal shows, one winter circus, and on a general average 300 vaudeville acts per week.

W. S. Cleveland, the manager of this Bee-Hive Exchange, has taken to booking road shows in the one, two and three-day stand theatres. During the past week and the present week he has placed Andrew Mack's big All-Star Vaudeville Alliance and Joe Shea's "Trust Busters," which include Daisy Harcourt, Harry Bulger, Mrs. Dr. Munyon and Company, Howard Brothers with their Flying Banjos, Warren Travis, Florence Lynne and Close Brothers. The salary list of the last named bunch tips the beam at $5,000 weekly.

ECLECTIC OPENS OFFICES IN SOUTH

The Eclectic Film Company, of 110 West Fortieth street, New York City, has opened offices at —— Atlanta, Ga., and at 202 Andrews Building, Dallas, Tex., where a rental business will be conducted.

The states that will be covered from these offices are North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, part of Oklahoma and Texas. It is the plan of the company to open additional exchanges as rapidly as it is found necessary to handle the business.

The Eclectic Feature Film Exchange is the name under which the business of the various rental exchanges will be conducted, and all of them will handle the entire line of features produced by the Eclectic Company.

Many exhibitors, who hitherto have been unable to book the Eclectic products owing to the conditions which have existed in certain sections of the country, will now be enabled to make arrangements with the newly established rental offices to furnish them with all features produced by the Eclectic Company.

This list includes: "Les Miserables," "Mysteries of Paris," "A Ruined Life," "Nero and Britannicus," "Wheel of Destruction," "Thrust of Hate," "When Paris Loves," "Vendetta," "Message of the Dead," "Doom of the Ocean," "The Fatal Plunge," "Toils of Villainy," and "His Fateful Passion."

J. C. CORWIN TO EXTEND FIELD

He purposes adding Northern Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana and later Kansas and Missouri.

Mr. Corwin now controls Itala, Solax, Blache, Great Northern and Gaumont features for Texas and Southern Oklahoma.

All are prepared to have a great time at the entertainment and ball, which promises to be the largest yet held, and will undoubtedly tax the capacity of Terrace Garden.

A glance through the list of boxholders shows the following: Vitagraph, Kalem, Kinemacolor, Famous Players, Mutual, Universal, General Film, World's Special, Thanhouser, Mayor Kline, Mayor-elect Mitchel, Supreme and Special Session Judges, United Electric Light and Power, Eclair and several License Bureau officials.

OHIO CONVENTION PLANS

The Ohio State Convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will be held in the Hotel Sinton, Cincinnati, on January 27, 28 and 29, 1914, and from indications already received the attendance bids fair to excel even the National Convention. Ohio, with her 633 members, will be present almost to a man, together with a large number from Kentucky, Indiana, West Virginia and other states.

The National Executive Board will meet at the hotel on January 26, and as all grievances, recommendations, reinstatements, etc., will be taken up, it is expected that this will be a very busy day in the history of the League.

Governor James M. Cox, Attorney General T. S. Hogan, Carl Laemmle, and others, have already accepted invitations to be present. The General Film, the Mutual Film, P. A. Powers, William H. Swanson, Harry Raver, and many other manufacturers and exhibitors have been invited.

The convention will be held in the large assembly room, which seats 800, and the exposition of arts will be given in the large ballroom, just across the hall, on the same floor as the assembly room. As the convention will all be under one roof and on the same floor, every exhibit will be seen, and every exhibitor will have to pass the doors of the hall of Exposition of Arts on his way to the convention hall. Five exposition spaces have already been contracted for by manufacturer. This will practically be a four days' convention.

A motion picture will be taken of every visitor. The Mayor of Cincinnati will open the convention on the 27th. The night of the 28th, a big banquet will be served. The convention will wind up with a grand ball.

WISCONSIN CONVENTION

The Wisconsin convention of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America will be held in Oshkosh on December 16 and 17, 1913.

The committee on arrangements and entertainment is John R. Elk, chairman; N. J. Hunze, Charles Porter, Jess Hogan and Arthur Gray.

The Wisconsin exhibitors are enthusiastic, and thirty new members have joined within the last eight days, and it is expected that at least fifty members will be enrolled before and during the convention.

State officers, together with a grievance, advisory and legislative committee, will be elected.

N. Y. EXHIBITORS TO MEET MONDAY

The monthly meeting of the Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Greater New York will be held at the Imperial Hotel, Broadway and Thirty-first street, on Monday morning, December 8, at 11 o'clock. Matters of importance will come up and several prominent speakers have promised to be present. Officials from the Fire Department have also been invited.

The Law and Legislation Committee will report on the proposed amendment to the Folks ordinance and other matters of interest to exhibitors.

The Motion Picture Machine Operators' Protective Union, Local 306 (formerly the Motion Picture Department of Local 35, I. A. T. S. E.,) has removed from 259 West Forty-second street to Room 1114 of the Exchange Building, 145 West Forty-fifth street, with change of telephone number to Bryant 6228.

INTERESTING FILM REVIEWS

Educational—Industrial—Scenic—General

"ALL For Science." (Biograph. Nov. 24.)—A detective drama with some inconsistencies. A man believing he has discovered a cancer cure secures money by theft. A detective discovers he is the thief on a mighty small clue. Discovering his love for the detective's stenographer he frees him.

"From Durban to Zululand." (Edison. Nov. 24. Split reel.)—An exceptionally interesting film. The photography is good. Durban, the capital of Natal, is a most clean and enterprising city. The dance of the native "Ricksha Devils" was fantastic to a degree. The dance of the chiefs in "full dress" was peculiar inasmuch as the full dress consisted of a smile, loin cloth and the proverbial beads.

"Enoch and Ezra's First Smoke." (Edison. Nov. 24. Split reel.)—On the same reel with "From Durban to Zululand." A harmless comedy. Two tots smoke, thinking they are thereby grown-up and get pretty sick. Gypsies in the neighborhood create much excitement and are accused of kidnapping the boys. Yale Boss and Andy Clark play the boys.

"The Leading Lady." (Vitagraph. Nov. 24.)—Director Ned Finley evidently believes this to be the best thing he has done. The title is "plastered" with his name. A husband is jealous of his actress wife. He finds on watching her that she is absolutely true and they are reconciled. It is odd to see Earle Williams as a "heavy." Edith Storey plays the lead and Ned Finley the husband.

"An Indian Maid's Strategy." (Kalem. Nov. 24.)—A rejuvenated idea. Remarkable scenery and clever work by the Indian girl get it across. An Indian maid, loving another, is espoused to the chief of another tribe. Koti, her lover, kills his rival, and manages after a series of adventures with the soldiers to escape with the girl. Plenty of action.

"Just Cissy's Little Way." (Lubin. Nov. 24.)—Arthur Johnson has never had a more agreeable vehicle. As a green country bumpkin he excels, his work getting the story across where another would have failed. Cy loves Sissy, and is very jealous of the minister she brings home from boarding school with her. He follows them to the city on her return, and getting into the house, threatens the minister. He laughs at the farmer, and knowing Cissy really loves him, marries the two before Cy has time to change his mind. Lottie Briscoe plays Cissy, and Howard Mitchell interprets the part of the minister.

"Quality of Mercy." (Selig. Two parts. Nov. 24.)—One of the best releases of the week. Emma, a country girl, loves Harvey, a city man of unscrupulous character, and consents to follow him to the city. Harvey's friend, knowing his character, disobeys his friend's injunctions and gets a real minister to marry them. The man leaves her later, after telling her that her marriage was illegitimate. She returns to her home in disgrace, with her little baby. Her husband is killed in an accident. The local physician after courting her for some time, at last gains her consent. The minister who marries them is the same one who has officiated before and he tells her the truth regarding her first venture. There are many strong features in the story. Thomas Santschi, E. Wallock, Adele Lane and Harry Lonsdale play the leading parts.

"The Lost Switch." (Lubin. Nov. 25.)—On the same reel with "Her Sick Father." A comedy, which will amuse. A husband carries his wife's switch with him to the city. Here he discovers it, and on receipt of a telegram from his wife, sends her an answer. His partner also sends a telegram regarding the switching of some hogs. The office boy mixes the two and the results are far from pleasant until the truth becomes known.

"Mounted Officer Flynn." (Selig. Nov. 25.)—A good dramatic story abounding in action. Flynn, a police officer, rescues some government plans from the spies who have stolen them and in reward receives the Congress medal. The fight in the deserted house with the two thieves is very thrilling. The photography is good.

"The Subterranean City." (Cines-Kleine. Nov. 25.)—This film has a strong dramatic interest. A bet is made between Arizona Bill and another club man that the former can discover the jewel thieves within a week. He sets out, finds their city under the ground, and is captured. A dancer whom he knew sets him free, but orders him to shoot himself. He does this and she takes the credit for having shot him. She is not believed and the two of them are supposedly killed. They escape together, and she appears on the stage at her usual time. The conspirators are arrested and the girl pardoned.

"The Vanishing Cracksman." (Edison. Nov. 25.)—Commencing a new series, on the same order as the "What Happened to Mary" stories. "Cleek of the Forty Faces" is the subject, this first story telling of his reformation from being the most successful crook known. He now becomes a detective. After warning Scotland Yard that he would rob a certain house, he does so in a very clever way. Benjamin F. Wilson plays Cleek and Gertrude McCoy plays the girl.

"Her Sick Father." (Lubin. Nov. 25. Split reel.)—On the same reel with "The Lost Switch." Her father is a hypochondriac, and it is Lillian's business to administer to him sundry patent medicines. At last tiring of this, she concocts the scheme of having her lover appear as a doctor. He does this and puts the old man through such exercise that he is only too glad to be well.

"Little Kaintuck." (Vitagraph. Nov. 25.)—It is the appeal to the sympathies that gets this picture over. There is many a heart throb. "Kaintuck" being made an orphan, takes to the road as a legitimate tramp. He meets Hedricks, a storekeeper in a rural neighborhood, and stays with him through the winter. In the spring he again takes to the road but returns, being unable to do without the old man. Paul Willis plays the boy, Daisy Smith does some good work as his mother, and Karl Formes plays the storekeeper.

"The Little Substitute." (Essanay. Nov. 25.)—Francis X. Bushman, Beverly Bayne and Helen Dunbar play the leading parts. A motherless baby is left in care of an aunt while the father goes away to Europe on a business trip. A little waif is left on the doorstep by a penniless woman. On the death of the first child the unknown baby is substituted. On the return of the father he is given the baby which is not his. The mother turns up, the aunt confesses, and to keep the child with him he marries the mother.

"Good Old Summer Time." (Kalem Split Reel. Nov. 28.)—With Ruth Roland, the "Kalem Girl," and John E. Brennan, the inimitable comedian. A mix-up in a hotel which is finally cleared by the clerk.

"England's King at Liverpool." (Kalem Split Reel. Nov. 28.)—On the same reel with the "Good Old Summer Time." Shows King George being greeted at Liverpool; President Poincaire of France at a celebration, and the English soldier at work and play. The last part was very interesting.

"Betty in the Lion's Den." (Vitagraph. Nov. 28.)—The "lions" here, though alive, are not at all fierce. They're society "lions." Betty breaks into society, and in order to prevent herself from marrying a "dude," she calls Brazilian extract to her aid and causes some "hops." Clara Kimball Young, Josie Sadler and Darwin Karr play the leads.

"A Disastrous Bet." (Lubin Split Reel. Nov. 27. General Film Co. Exclusive Service.)—The scenario was written by Carl Levi of the Loew Company's offices. He deserves commendation. One man wagers his beard and loses. His wife believes him to be a burglar, and there's a great rumpus until the truth is made clear.

"Love and Trouble." (Lubin Split Reel. Nov. 27. General Film Co. Exclusive Service.)—A rural story on the same reel with "A Disastrous Bet." A lunatic causes much trouble for everyone with the exception of two lovers, whom he helps. The story is, of course, impossible but that does not greatly lessen its value as a comedy.

"A Thousand Dollars Short." (Patheplay. Nov. 27. General Film Co. Exclusive Service.)—A good drama with many points that will commend it to the average audience. A boy being in need of money, borrows a check from a friend and changes the amount. The married sister apeals to her husband but is refused and is caught at the house of the friend, pleading with him for mercy. The unexpected presence of his mother saves the situation and explains her presence.

"In the Grasp of the Apaches." (Warner's Features. Three Parts.)—Plenty of action and good settings make this old idea serviceable. Believing his wife to be false, a "Count" steals her child and leaves it on the bridge, not meaning him to be stolen. The apaches get the boy and teach him to steal. His only friend is Elga, another little captive. After years the brigands see an advertisement for Otto and bring the Count to their rendezvous, but being unable to find Otto, try to give him another child, which he refuses. The Count and Otto escape. Elga is made to help the brigands recapture him and goes to his house. There she warns him and the villains are captured and Elga adopted as companion to Otto.

"A Florentine Tragedy." (Warner's Features. Three Parts.)—After the story of the same name by Oscar Wilde. There are parts of it which escape the strict laws of the Censorship Board by a narrow margin. The tale is of the middle centuries and tells of the selling of a girl to an old man for a bag of gold. She is loved by a prince, who calls and sees her when her husband is away. The husband catches them together and kills the prince in the duel which follows. The girl then sees her mistake and throws herself in her husband's arms. Constance Crawley, Arthur Maude and Wilfred Lucas play the important parts.

"The Water War." (Bison Two Reels.)—A little variance from the usual run of Bison pictures. Woodward, the foreman of the work on the aqueduct, is discharged and Clifford given his job. With the help of some Indians he plans to revenge himself on his successor. They are frustrated greatly through the aid of an Indian girl, Nereda.

"The Blight of Wealth." (Thanhouser. Two Reels. Nov. 25.)—The title of this is poor, meaning nothing. A quarry owner marries a rich heiress. Formerly a hard worker, he now neglects his business and goes to Europe. He loses his quarry, his wife loses her fortune and together they come back and start afresh. The episode of a duel between the husband and an attentive Count makes good material.

"War-Ridden Juarez." (Kalem. Nov. 22.)—Not listed as a regular release, this picture is interesting just at this time. The scenes shown, however, have been pictured before. "Red" Lopez, an American of notorious character, poses. Federal jail and prisoners are shown. The small international bridge over the Rio Grande is also interesting.

"The Laundress and the Lady." (Kalem. Split Reel. Nov. 21.)—Same reel with "The Dublin Horse Show." A clever, impossible comedy, which will cause much laughter. Mrs. Graves wants a laundress and her son Robert writes Mary Flanagan, telling her to come to work. He also writes his fiancée, Mary, inviting her to a matinee and enclosing a ticket. The letters are mixed. The laundress goes to the show and the cook makes Mary Hall wash. All is straightened out. Anyone who says this business is not as good as the "legitimate" should see this picture. Robert takes Mary to a motion picture theatre. The interior is the cheapest imitation of a theatre imaginable. The settings are very poor.

"The End of the Circle." (Essanay. Two Parts. Nov. 21.)—A "Western," with less than the usual amount of action and possessing a good story. Two rivals want the same girl. The villain puts the favored one in a compromising light and the girl in anger marries the other. A Mexican girl plays a large part in this. The time passes and the girl, thoroughly unhappy with her drunken husband, is forced to submit for her child's sake. The husband is killed, the news being brought by her former lover. She drops dead from exposure, having time, however, to ask forgiveness of the man she hurt. He adopts the child. No names are mentioned in any of the sub-titles. Lois Ingraham, as the child, was very camera-shy and hurt the effect. Frederick Church, Eleanor Blevins, True Boardman and Evelyn Selbie completed the cast.

"A Dutch Love Story." (Pathe. Two Parts. Nov. 19. General Film Co. Exclusive Service.)—In this picture, though long spaces of time elapse, the women are just as youthful. Hans and Minna are married, both for the second time, against everyone's wishes. Jan, Hans's son, enlists for six years and goes away, his grandmother also leaving her son's home. Katrina, Minna's daughter, loves Jan, though never having met him. Hans and Minna are very happy together. Jan returns after his enlistment and marries Katrina, and so all are reconciled. Some needless trick photography is introduced.

"A Railroad Wooing." (Kalem. Nov. 19. General Film Co. Exclusive Program.)—Engineers and firemen in full-dress, silk hats, etc., are an odd combination. Helen and her girl friend meet Bill and Joe, engineer and fireman, respectively. They save the girls' lives and are suspended thirty days for neglect of duty. During that time they again meet the girls and become engaged. Considering they acknowledge they are paupers, where did the money for the rings come from? On their way to the wedding (in the aforesaid costume) the engineer and fireman of the train they are on are hurt and they take their places. They marry the girls at the station and then proceed. Why the remorse on both sides later? They act as though they are all sorry for the marriage.

"Broncho Billy's First Arrest." (Essanay. Nov. 22.)—G. M. Anderson and Marguerite Clayton play together very well. Billy is made sheriff. He is engaged to be married to Tess when a stranger arrives who is dressed very well. He is also supposedly a pianist of note. Tess takes to him and leaves with him for the city. Billy learns that he is a crook and "wanted." He rides after him, catching him on the train. The girl returns to Billy's arms.

"Primitive Man." (Kalem. Nov. 22.)—A peculiar story. Good directing and photography. A girl of the mountains is forcibly kissed by a young hermit. She forsakes her other lover and marries the hermit. The rival returns and she attempts to drive him away. The "primitive man" sees this and, misunderstanding, leaves her. The arrival of a baby brings them together again.

"The Nihilist's Daughter." (World Special Film Co. Two Reels.)—A strong, gripping story, manufactured by the Savoia Company. The scenes are very good, and the action of timely interest. A Russian nihilist is captured while bidding adieu to his family and taken to prison, from whence he escapes. He goes to his home again and then reaches the State line in safety. The police follow him, and, while he is hiding in an aqueduct, the water is turned on and he escapes through blind luck. The police tell his family that he is dead and the shock kills his wife. The child, adopted by the police captain, later marries an officer. She sees her father occasionally. One day the chauffeur informs her husband that she is carrying on an affair, and her father is shot as an affinity. He is but wounded and, after recuperating, goes on his way.

"Toils of Villainy." (Eclectic. Three parts.)—One of the natural color pictures made by this company. There is plenty of opportunity given for a good display of tints and the effects are very beautiful. The story is French and abounds with excitement. With the usual love of the melodramatic, a clever escape is staged, the girl walking over a telegraph wire from the window, when she is locked indoors.

Marvin, a circus-owner, hates Tom, a jockey of the circus, and discharges him. He obtains work with a race-track man and rides the winning horse in the races. Marvin attempts to shoot him at a lonely stretch of the track, but is frustrated by Alice, Tom's sweetheart.

"The Golden Pathway." (Vitagraph. Nov. 29. Two reels.)—James marries an artist's model and is cut off from his uncle's will. A clause of the will leaves him the entire estate if he will divorce the girl. She goes to Reno, but later they are reunited, deciding that happiness together is better than riches apart. A codicil made later gives them the fortune in either case.

"To Err Is Human." (Gaumont. Three reels.)—The story is clearly and well told, and points out a wife's duty to her husband.

Meral, a composer, is fascinated by a dancer. His wife, despite his liason, is true to him, and finally manages to bring him back to her and his work.

SPECIAL FILM REVIEWS

"THE Stigma." (Essanay.)—An exceptionally strong story winds its way through this film. Its author is to be congratulated. The production is psychological in its nature, growing stronger with each succeeding scene and finishes with a force that is in keeping with the rest of the subject. The producer is to be commended on his splendid selection of scenes, and the actors are to be praised for their good work. Francis X. Bushman and Beverly Bayne in the leading roles give the characters they visualize an individuality and personality that can come only from artists of their calibre. Mr. Bushman, as the lover, plays his part comprehendingly. He plays it as one would wish to see it played, all unconscious of the dread disease that has assailed the girl he loves. When he is made aware of it, he does not hesitate to sacrifice all his home ties to be with her during the few hours that are still allotted to her in this world. Miss Bayne, as the leper, is convincing in her efforts to keep the others from contracting the awful disease without revealing her secret, and the supreme sacrifice at the end of her trials is carried out with a vividness that strikes home.

The very first scene showing the sailing vessel with all its canvas stretched taut with a background of miles and miles of water, floats before one like a splendid painting. In its entirety the picture shows splendid judgment of scenic effects.

Walking along the shore with his sweetheart Jane (Betty Brown), Clifford Harvey (Francis X. Bushman) notices a speck afloat on the seething waters. On closer inspection with his glasses, he notices that it is a raft with a girl clinging to it. He secures the services of several fishermen nearby and with their aid rescues the survivor of the wreck Alice Madden, (Beverly Bayne.) He takes her to his home and with the assistance of his mother, revives her. When she regains consciousness she warns everyone from her but gives no reason for her actions. As time passes Clifford forgets his former sweetheart, Jane, and notices the beauty and talent of Alice. She, however, endeavors to escape from her rescuers, but is prevailed upon to stay in the village until she grows stronger.

One day several of the fishermen notice a trunk that has floated in and bring it to the home of Clifford where it is opened. The log-book reveals the fact that the ship was loaded with lepers destined for a secluded island. The community then realize that Alice is afflicted with this dread disease and they drive her from the village. Clifford's love for her is of the kind that comes to a man but once in a lifetime and he joins her in her flight. His father becomes enraged and wishes to send both of them into eternity. But his mother interferes and the two make their camp on a nearby island. Alice, knowing that she is only risking the life of her lover by remaining with him, seeks eternal rest in the waters from which she was rescued. She is joined there by Clifford, whose future was cast with her when he left his home ties and friends for her. C. J. V.

"A Daughter of Pan." (Warner Feature.)—Mr. Gaskill in devoting himself to mythology as a source of inspiration for his motion pictures reveals the possession of a mind none too common in this field. He has evidently applied himself to the task of getting as far as possible away from the "usual thing." The result is that he is creating for himself a reputation for unconventionality of theme.

"A Daughter of Pan" of course deals with the eternal love problem—with jealousy, misunderstanding, unrequited love, and the quadrilaterality of the tender passion, but in the end everything is straightened out, or it should be in all well-ordered love stories.

But the manner of working out this theme is refreshing in the extreme. You seem, in looking at this beautifully composed and acted and well photographed series of incidents, to be next to a transcript of that form of life of which we read in the classics—or of which we had to read when we were obliged to study the classics. It is a refined offering, admirably acted as a whole, but here and there showing evidences of inability on the part of the actors to interpret the classic spirit. But it is a pleasing picture and Miss Gardner demonstrates her power and versatility in the leading part.

The photographic part of the work has been extremely well done—composition, lighting, exposure and printing being unexceptionally good. It is a charming picture.

"Jack." (World Special Films Corp. Four reels.)—After the well-known book of Alphonse Daudet. Through his many trials and tribulations Jack is followed. The shipwreck scene is very impressive and shows real action. The photography and settings are good. The story is well known.

"The Gunmaker of Moscow." (Edison. Two reels. Nov. 28.)—A powerful drama, literally teeming with action. The photography throughout is excellent, and the parts well played It received a very good hand at the Savoy theatre, New York, even from the sleepy morning crowd.

THE DANCER IN GAUMONT'S THREE-REEL DRAMA "TO ERR IS HUMAN"
(Released December 26th.)

Rosaline is left by her dying father in the care of the Duke of Tula, together with her fortune. As the years pass by the Count objects to the attentions paid her by Ruric, a plebeian. He wishes his nephew to win her. A duel is fought in which the gun-maker is victorious. Having befriended the emperor, the charge of murder brought by the Duke is thrown out. Unable to win the girl's fortune in any other way he tries to force her marriage, but the emperor has the Duke thrown in prison and unites Ruric and Rosaline.

The players were: Yale Boss, Edna Hamel, Barry O'Moore, Benjamin F. Wilson (lead), Robert Brower, May Abbey (lead), Harry Gripp, Charles Ogle and Bigelow Cooper.

"Cry of the Blood." (Lubin. Nov. 28. Three reels. General Film Company Exclusive Service.)—"Calf" love is entirely out of this picture and it is not missed in the least. The story is one possessing great strength and will be appreciated wherever shown.

Mrs. Jamieson, unable herself to bear children, adopts the child of drunken parents and deceives her husband into believing it her own. Years pass by and the young man's blood shows the taint of his parents. He becomes a thief and finally a murderer. In the final courtroom scene the wife tells the truth, and the boy's rightful mother takes the place she should have held. Much truth in the tale and it is well and clearly told. Written by George Terwilliger.

"The Sunken Treasure." (Kleine-Cines.) Seville, Spain, again forms the background in this multiple reel of Spanish customs and architecture. This fiery blooded race enter into their work before the camera with a snap and vigor that fills the production with interesting material and a well-rounded-out story. The scene of the divers underneath the water is especially good. An exciting race between automobile and train forms a thrill part of the production. Some of the same actors play "Love of a Toreador." The fine work they did in that picture is duplicated in "The Sunken Treasure." This story, however, deals more with life at sea.

Pretty Louise, the daughter of Michel, the employer of George and Peter, two divers, is the center of the love of both of these heroes of the deep seas. She, however, shows a preference for George. Peter, jealous of his friend and rival, plans a revenge. Michel obtains a contract to find a sunken treasure in a vessel lying in the ocean's bed, and the two divers are engaged to do the work.

Peter, however, turns traitor, and in a belief that he can gain possession of the treasure himself and thus rid himself of his rival he plans with another diver to cut the air pipes which supply George with air while he is in the water. He suceeds in doing so. While George is recovering from the shock, Peter returns to the scene of action and succeeds in finding the loot.

After making careful preparations, Peter takes flight on a passenger train for a distant city where he intends disposing of the treasure. George, through a friend, discovers the route he has taken, but arrives just as the train is pulling out. He presses into service a nearby automobile, and an exciting chase ensues. The auto proves to be a little faster than the train and at a crossroad stops in the middle of the tracks and compels the engine to stop. While he is entering the car from one side, Peter leaves it from the other and steals the machine left by George and his companions. He is some distance on his way before they discover his strategy. Fortunately, however, another car is just passing and after explaining their mission the owner of it permits them to use it.

Peter, however, reaches the docks in advance, boards a waiting vessel and endeavors to hide himself in one of the storerooms. His hiding place is discovered, but he keeps his pursuers at bay with his revolver. One of the bullets of the officers ignite the powder with which the room is stored and the explosion which follows wrecks the ship and kills Peter. In the confusion George finds the treasure, delivers it to Michel and returns to Louise.

"The Pale-face Squaw." (Laclede. Three parts.) This film is especially important as being the first production of a new firm. As the name indicates, it is a Western subject and it ranks high among its kind. In the production great care has evidently been used, with the result that the atmosphere of the Wild West and the days when eternal vigilance was the price of liberty are faithfully reproduced on the screen.

The Byers and Martin families go West with their covered camp wagons. The Indians, led by Chief Red Dog, attack the Byers family on horseback. A fierce fight follows and little Polly, frightened, runs and hides in the woods. After the fight, Red Dog finds little Polly and adopts her. Then the white men get thicker and thicker, and he quits the country.

Years later Jim Martin and Anna Byers are sweethearts while Polly is still among the Indians, wooed by the Raven. Anna's father turns to the roulette wheel for his enjoyment. Polly is rescued from the unwelcome advances of the Raven by Jim Martin. An exciting fight on horseback between Jim and the Indian chief follows. Both fall from their horses. Then the other Indians ride up.

Byers gambles away even his daughter's jewelry. The Raven with Jim a captive, tortures him by forcing him to witness the attack by the Indians upon the home of his sweetheart. She, inside, defends the cabin. One Indian starts to come down the chimney but is smoked out by the girl and falls to the floor unconscious. The Indians break down the door and stream in when Polly saves the day. The father opens the locket and recognizes Polly as his daughter. At this juncture the relief party of settlers arrives and the Indians are whipped. Then follows the reunion of the father and daughter.

"Whimsical Threads of Destiny." (Vitagraph. Nov. 22. Two Parts.)—A method by which those over-burdened with wealth may know to whom to leave it. Webster, an old millionaire, is believed dead and has left his total wealth to a nephew and niece, providing they marry each other. Both are willing until the man, Dr. Hale Webster, meets an equestrienne, with whom he falls in love. He gives up all claim to the money because of his love for the girl. The niece plans to make him marry her so that they may get the fortune. But the two lovers stay true, and the old man comes to "life," disowning the scheming niece and giving his fortune to Dr. Webster. Exciting action is staged. The acrobats are played by Elsie and Vera St. Leon and their brother, Charles Kent. Harry Northrup. Julia Swayne Gordon, Courtenay Foot and William R. Dunn complete the cast.

"Wanted — A Burglar." (Edison, Dec. 1.)—A clever, original comedy, that should greatly amuse.

An editor of a country weekly dares any one to steal $300 from his safe. His daughter does the trick. The printer wins the girl by producing her as the thief.

"Venomous Tongues." (Celio Kleine. Dec. 2. Two parts.)—One of the worst curses a man or woman may have is that of a scandalous tongue. This story, which was made abroad, tells of the worries a husband goes through over the false reports he hears about his wife. He finally kills her. Photography in places might be improved.

"The Wreck." (Vitagraph. Dec. 2. Three parts.)—One of the best regular releases of the year. The photography is pleasing, and the casting good. Carlyle, a railroad president disappointed with his son, secures a position for Dick, a friend's son, with his railroad. His wife, loving him dearly, also loves her stepson and helps him all she can. She has many secret conferences with Dick, which Carlyle misunderstands.

Finally he kills Dick in a moment of passion, the act being witnessed by an engineer he had discharged. The workman is reinstated and drives his train past danger signals and into another engine. The wreck scene is wonderfully portrayed. Carlyle and his son are both killed in the wreck. Static streaks show in one scene. One or two inconsistencies do not materially hurt the picture.

"The Black Countess." (Patheplay. Three parts. Dec. 2. General Film Co. Exclusive Service.)—Made by the Paris Pathe Company, probably. The title is clever, though meaning little. Two reels would have been better than the three given, the action appearing padded and consequently interest is lost.

The story tells of a young doctor and his colleague to whose daughter he is engaged. He meets the Countess and she fascinates him. By a clever ruse the Countess gets the doctor's daughter to break her engagement, but later when in kreat need of professional services she confesses that her love for the young man had caused her to hunt the doctor.

Pathe's Weekly. (Pathe, Dec. 1.)—A number of the weekly which does not contain much news of vital interest. The recent meeting in New York City of the Salvation Army forces under Booth, and Cardinals Gibbons and Farley in Washington, are perhaps the most interesting items.

"The Blight." (Patheplay, Nov. 29.)—In the last few months a large number of dramas have been produced dealing with psychological subjects. This is one of them, and rather better than the average.

A boy, the son of a criminal, becomes very influential in business. He becomes engaged to his partner's daughter, but the affair is stopped on their wedding day because of the taint in his blood.

"Turning the Tables." (Lubin, Nov. 29.)—One of the Lubin Mexico stories that have achieved an enviable reputation for that company.

Bob, a ranger, while really in love with May, becomes infatuated with a Mexican girl, who leads him in the mountains, where he is captured by the bandits under her father. The boy is rescued by May, and together they lead their rangers to the attack and capture the outlaws. Plenty of action carries the story "across."

"Melita's Sacrifice." (Lubin, Dec. 1).—The story is laid in Mexico and makes a good release.

Jess Mason, a cowboy, protects a Mexican girl from an insulter, thereby provoking the Mexican's hatred and arousing the girl's love. He is captured later when with his fiancee, but both are saved by Melita.

"The Cypher Message." (Selig. Two reels. Dec. 1.)—One scene where the detective gets the other's coat by mistake and wears it is inconsistent.

The story deals with two society crooks who communicate by cypher letters. They are at last caught through one of their letters being translated.

"Princess Elena's Prisoner." (Great Northern.)—This multiple reel release serves to introduce to the American motion picture public a new European actress, Betty Nansen, whose reputation has been swiftly made. Large sums have been paid for her services. She is to appear in six Nordisk pictures, of which that under review is the first. Viewing the picture, it must be conceded that Miss Nansen has the gift of tragedy of a high order. She is a mental actress of the calibre of Mrs. Fiske—and, like that lady, obtains her effects by an apparent minimum of physical effort.

The story has to do with her intrigue with a young officer, who is discovered and is ordered to be shot, but the princess secures his escape. Discovery confronts the princess with the necessity of dying with her lover. He, however, prefers to live for his country. She aids him to escape and herself dies from shock, not, however, before undergoing great mental agonies at his desertion.

In this character Miss Nansen acts with superb conviction, the part of the film where she surveys the hand which her lover has kissed before he goes away being very finely rendered.

The photography of this picture is alone worth study—it is so true and at the same time so artistic—there is nothing faked about it. It is a fine picture, acted and produced well. Miss Nansen is sure to be popular with audiences here. We would like to hand a compliment to the actor who plays the part of the Prime Minister in the picture. He signs a death warrant like a Spartan and then lights a cigar with such convincing coolness that you would think signing death warrants is the business of his life.

ANOTHER THANHOUSER STUDIO

C. J. Hite, of the Thanhouser Film Corporation, is still planning big things for his New Rochelle company. Announcement is now made that plans have been prepared and approved by the building inspector for another glass-inclosed stage in addition to the present large plant, which has been completely outgrown. The new stage, it is expected, will cost about $15,000.

Main street and Echo avenue will be the address of the new stage. It will cover a floor space of 95x75 feet, and the huge steel skeleton will be inclosed with a new style wire glass of great refractive power. This arrangement, it is said, will diffuse the light without the aid of the usual white cloth curtains.

FOREST FIRES ADDS REALISM

The aggressiveness of the American Film Manufacturing Company in realizing the pictorial value of a real forest fire is responsible for the success of the production, "Trapped in a Forest Fire." The first scenes of this picture were taken during the recent devastating fires that swept through and destroyed vast areas of gorgeous forests in Southern California.

The camera man showed great pluck in facing the scorching flames and intense heat, and despite the fact that they were overcome several times stuck to their posts until the directors called them off.

Sydney Ayres plays the lead and Vivian Rich does some very pretty acting. The subject will be released Monday, December 8.

OCEAN TRAVELERS "WORK" FOR RELIANCE

As the largest ocean liner afloat, the "Imperator," was about to leave her moorings on her last trip, the passengers were unconsciously posing for a motion picture camera. They did not even take a second look at the stylishly gowned Norma Phillips and her actor companions of Reliance, who were working among them for the benefit of a film and many of them will be very much surprised "to see themselves as others see them" in a motion picture theatre.

Travers Vale, the producer, realized that he would have to work very carefully in order to keep the passengers from knowing that they were being photographed so that they would not look at the camera and spoil the dramatic value of his work. Several scenes were taken on the different decks of the huge vessel, together with an excellent view of the great boat getting under way for her ocean voyage.

ECLAIR FILM COMPANY ANNOUNCES NEW SERIES

The Eclair Film Company has just completed negotiations and concluded contracts with some of the ablest and most popular of American authors for exclusive screen rights to their books and novels. These films will be released on the Universal program.

Notable among the early releases in this series are the following

"The Case of Cherry Purcelle," by Arthur Stringer, widely known as one of the foremost of present day American poets and writers. This will be followed by a series of Mr. Stringer's detective stories, which are now a feature of one of the leading magazines.

A Mexican story by Eleanor Gates, whose style and diction are known to magazine readers everywhere.

An exciting French refugee story by Harris Dickson, which will shortly be featured in a well-known magazine.

A Western yarn of the kind for which Eugene Manlove Rhodes is famous.

Several of the stories by the late O. Henry, a number of whose works have already been produced by the Eclair Company, will also be included in the series.

AMERICAN THREE-REEL

A three-reel melodramtaic romance written by Marc E. Jones, and produced by Lorimer Johnston, will soon be announced by the American Film Manufacturing Company, of Santa Barbara, Cal.

Mr. Jones made a trip from New Orleans to Santa Barbara to pay a visit to the American studios there. He has proven a prolific writer and holds a record of having placed sixty plays in eight months.

KLEINE'S "POMPEII" BREAKS RECORD

What probably establishes a unique record among picture theatres was made last week at the People's Theatre, Portland, Oregon, when 32,000 people paid admission to George Kleine's "The Last Days of Pompeii." The receipts for the week were $4,224.20. Manager Winstock is telling his friends of the new record.

Kleine's "Pompeii" also broke a Salt Lake City record when receipts at the American Theatre on November 10 were $591.50; November 11, $620.15; November 12, $690.96, totaling for a three-day engagement, the astonishing sum of $1,902.60.

JUST PLAIN COMMON SENSE tells you when you want to SEE yourself you use a Mirror. Because you SEE yourself better with a Mirror than any other means in the world. Now the same thing applies when you want to SEE motion pictures, use a MIRROR SCREEN because you SEE the pictures so much plainer, better and clearer on a Mirror Screen than on any other surface under the sun. Besides, it tickles your patrons and makes picture fans. It's a fact. The difference between a motion picture on a MIRROR SCREEN and any other screen of any other kind is the same comparison between seeing your own reflection in a fine French plate glass mirror and in a mud puddle. The 'MIRROR SCREEN' is a Mirror. A magnificent mirror made from the finest polished plate glass that the world can produce. Get Right and Write to us to-day for our new Snow White Prismized Finished Surface.

"Exchangemen and Their Troubles"

Is the title of a series of splendid articles to begin shortly in The Motion Picture News. We were greatly surprised to find, after reading some of the articles in this series already submitted, that there are so many different ways, as yet untried, by which exhibitors and exchangemen can co-operate to the profit of both.

It is really worth anyone's time to read these stories. The first will appear in an early issue.

PRODUCTION OF "BEN BOLT" DRAWS CROWDS

The Solax production of "Ben Bolt" is a thrilling adaptation from the poem by Thomas English Dunn and popularized by its introduction in Du Maurier's "Trilby." The poster array is creating considerable gossip.

Several of the scenes were taken in Newport and in some of the old towns of Connecticut. In one of the thrilling scenes the old mill in New London is used. The leading character is photographed bound to the spokes of the revolving wheel of the mill. The scene enacted brought out the entire population of New London to witness it and at the time it was "a three-day wonder."

In Newport the company was besieged by a corps of war correspondents from the local papers. In fact, the Newport Herald had a big bulletin in front of its headquarters giving hourly news of the Solax activities in and about the vicinity. This, of course, made work difficult as the crowds that gathered in the different places to witness the scenes at times interfered with the direction, but it did not interfere with the results.

TWO NEW "FLYING A" PRODUCTIONS

Lorimer Johnston, director of the first company of the American Film Manufacturing Co., at Santa Barbara, Cal., has a production this week that will cause great comment called "The Occult." The double exposures are said to be of unusual excellence.

Mr. Johnston has just finished the first three-reel taken by the "Flying A." This will be called "Destinies Fulfilled," and will be scheduled for an early release. It was written by Marc Edmund Jones.

KLEINE'S "POMPEII" EDUCATIONAL FACTOR

George Kleine's "The Last Days of Pompeii" is creating many holidays for school children in the various cities where it is playing. The Western towns seem particularly anxious that their children shall obtain the benefit of the historical data which has made Kleine's "Pompeii" so noteworthy. Despite the big success of "Quo Vadis," that beautiful drama was never so eagerly accepted by school superintendents as a text for children to study as "Pompeii."

WAIFS SEE "QUO VADIS?"

The Children's Home, of Urbana, O., poured its hundreds of little waifs into a theatre to see "Quo Vadis?" last week. They were the guests of George Kleine.

A drama of love and sacrifice. Although Jane was a victim of leprosy, Clifford Harvey's love for her grew stronger each day. She loved him, too—so much that she sacrificed her life to save him from the terrible plague. He followed her to the beyond, where there are no ills. This is a feature heart interest story of pathos.

MUSIC AND THE PICTURES

of the two present films "Last Days of Pompeii." I have seen one only, but I will say that I don't care to see the second one as, no matter how perfect it may be, it would appear very inferior to me, unless if it was shown by Rothapfel. This is what music can do. Appropriate and well-timed music can enhance the beauty of any picture, while incongruous music can ruin a master production. J. M. B.

"FLYING A" PLAYERS HAVE PARTY

The members of the American Film Manufacturing Company's studio at Santa Barbara, Cal., the home of the "Flying A" productions, had a kid party not long ago. Miss Ida Lewis entertained.

Nearly all the guests carried toys of some sort and represented different characters. Among those present were: Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Ricketts, as "Shipahoy" and Gretchen; Louise Lester, as a baby doll that Calamity Anne had lost; Julius Frankenberg and Vivian Rich, Buster Brown and his sister, Mary Jane. Jack Richardson, as a freckle-faced boy with a stationary smile; Ed Coxen, as a Santa Barbara muchacho from the period of 1850; Harry Von Meter, as honey boy; Mrs. Harry Von Meter and Mr. Orahood as the heavenly twins; and Charlotte Burton, as little girl in blue. All the others present were in their best infantile bibs and tuckers.

AMMEX FEATURE SALES

In the interest of Ammex Western Features F. D. Halliday, general sales manager, took a flying trip to New England last week. Among the recent sales of Ammex features in heretofore unsold territory is "The Fatal Reckoning" to the Victor Film Exchange of Buffalo; and also to the Universal Film Exchange of New York City. The Consolidated Film Company, Ltd., of Montreal has also purchased rights on "The Fatal Reckoning" and "The Barrier of Blood."

AMERICAN PRODUCTIONS VARIED

The subjects being released by the American Film Manufacturing Company are of a character that each week's productions might well be termed a separate and distinct variety. Society dramas, allegorical gems, comedies and Western dramas, each of a distinctive type, are keeping "Flying A" subjects in the first class as drawing cards for the theatres catering to the best patronage.

NEW RELIANCE STUDIO COMPLETED

Edward B. Kinsila Designs Practical Structure

Edward B. Kinsila, architect and builder, the moving picture expert who recently built in Berlin, Germany, perhaps the finest theatre devoted to moving pictures in the world for A. H. Woods and an American syndicate, where the pictures may be shown in a brilliantly lighted auditorium by an ingenious arrangement of indirect lighting and a thoroughly darkened stage, has just completed a new studio on practical and scientific lines for the Reliance and Majestic companies on their lately acquired Clara Morris estate at Yonkers.

The studio itself is 100 feet by 50 feet, and is built of skeleton steel and white ground glass, all resting on a fifteen foot ceilinged concrete basement to elevate it sufficiently to admit uninterrupted lateral light. The entire roof and the three sides exposed to the sun are built of ground glass set in steel frames too slender to cast a shadow. Ample ventilation is provided by a double row of ventilators along the ridge of the roof and another row under the eaves, all of which may be regulated by turning a wheel on the studio floor. The side rows of sash are portable and may be removed in the warm summer months.

Three slender trollies that support artificial lights operating on rollers permit of a concentration of artificial lights at any desired point when the daylight is not sufficiently strong, or a combination of artificial and daylight may be used. The floor is well supplied with traps to be used in making pictures. The studio is heated by steam coils fixed to a two-foot base at the bottom of the three glass sides.

The north wall, against which is placed the scene dock and a scene painter's frame, is pierced at its middle by a large door designed to communicate with an additional building that will be erected for the storage of properties and additional dressing-rooms. The entire basement will be used for factory purposes.

FINE INTERIORS CREATE COMMENT

"When a Woman Wills," the Kleine-Cines subject to be released Tuesday, December 30, will be a film containing some of the most remarkable interiors ever seen in a motion picture film. "Still" pictures of some of these interiors have excited so much comment that a number of trade papers and film story magazines have asked permission to use photographs of the interiors in forthcoming numbers for frontispieces, covers, etc.

GREAT NORTHERN SPECIAL COMING

The Great Northern Special Feature Film Company announces "In the Bonds of Passion," a three-reel subject that lives up to the traditional excellence of the product of this concern. It is a story of love in the beginning, but later unrequited by the young aristocrat, who finds his mother's secretary winsome and confiding.

There are many thrilling situations throughout the three reels, among these being the plunge of the child from a third story window, the self-administered poison taken in mistake for liquor and the powerful lesson carried throughout realistically.

As usual the photography of the Great Northern Company is of the highest grade and the full strength of acting forces is brought into requisition.

MASONIC ORDERS INTERESTED

The announcement of the release of the two-part American subject "The Shriner's Daughter" for December 22, has aroused much interest on the part of various Masonic orders.

At the executive offices of the American Film Manufacturing Company it is said that the subject is one of great merit as it was especially written for the occasion of the Big Shrine Concert Tour "Hands Around the State," with the combined bands of patrols of San Diego, Los Angeles, Oakland and San Francisco, and tells an absorbingly interesting story of the experiences of a "Shriner."

The film is already in demand. Attractive three and six-sheet posters have been issued.

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality — that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

CHARLES KLEIN'S
The Third Degree

was the surest dramatic hit of recent years in New York and throughout the United States.

The Third Degree

has been declared by critics to be the most intense, thrilling and sincere play of its important class. With the co-operation of the author, and a remarkable cast of actors and actresses selected for their especial fitness to enact its very exacting characters,

The Third Degree

has been reproduced by the Lubin Company as a

5-Reel Feature Photoplay.

No play from the "speaking stage" ever lent itself so perfectly to motion pictures and no finer feature film has ever been turned out.

Full line of advertising matter, heralds, lithographs and lobby displays of the same unusual quality that characterizes all such matter originated by the General Film Company accompanies

The Third Degree

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality — that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

THE "PUNCH" IN ADVERTISING

A FEATURE film buyer came to New York last week on a still hunt for features that were NOT sensational.

HE has many interesting things to say.

* * *

ONE was: That his exhibitor trade does not want sensational films, because their audiences don't want them and have told the exhibitors so very plainly.

ANOTHER was: That he had to refuse several good features for the simple reason that, while they were not at all sensational, their titles were and so were the posters—decidedly so.

BOTH were unfortunately misleading; so much so that—in this instance at least—they prevented the sale of the films.

THEN we fell to analyzing the craze for sensationalism.

"IT proceeds—in my opinion"—said the feature buyer, "from the effort to make a picture with a 'punch' in it. But a mistaken idea has been developed of just what gives a punch."

IN order to punch people it is not necessary to enact the horrible, to tell the unspeakable or grossly exaggerate. We, all of us, get enough punches in our daily hours. Why not depict these real incidents, for instance.

THE stage has gone through much the same experience as the picture is now going through. Only a few years ago we had to have our actors and actresses "made up" and they dealt in impossible melodrama—because it was thought the audiences wanted these exaggerated effects.

THEN along came a playwright who wrote a play of real everyday life, in which real everyday people acted, and lo! a new era of plays "with the punch was introduced."

MUCH more might be written along these lines involving the future of the feature film; but this talk has to do with advertising.

AS with posters, so with other forms of advertising, and it is not only unnecessary to attempt the sensational, but it is bad advertising.

IT is bad advertising because it is almost certain to be misleading and fewer and fewer of the buying public nowadays are willing to be misled.

PEOPLE are most interested in everyday life. Buyers are most interested in facts!

THE keynote of advertising is simplicity.

THE skilled advertiser works with small words; they fit into the mind more easily. He picks out one selling argument and plugs away at it. He uses few words and makes every one count for all it is worth. He uses clean, expressive type and plenty of white space.

HE makes you want to read his announcement—and then makes you want to buy—and then makes it easy for you to buy.

IT isn't necessary to shout and swagger in advertising; nor to give an advertisement a gaudy raiment of ultra-sensationalism.

YOU would not instruct your salesman to go into a man's office with a leap and a yell; neither would you have him flippant or "smart" in his talk; nor would you dress him up in a bal masquè costume.

ON the contrary, you force him to keep to solid facts, to be brief and to the point, to be clean-cut in appearance.

* * *

YOUR advertising is simply printed selling talk. Therefore you will not tolerate in it anything you would not put up with in your personal salesmanship.

WRITE copy as you talk—only be much more brief—is the best advertising maxim.

AND talk facts!

NEW YORK FEATURE BUYERS GET TOGETHER

Twenty-One Firms Form Feature Film Protective Association to Co-operate on Bad Accounts, Fight "Pirates" and "Dupers" and Endeavor to Get Manufacturers to Produce More High Class Features

REPRESENTATIVES of twenty-one firms located in New York City, which purchase feature films and rent them to exhibitors, met recently in the offices of the Advance Feature Film Company at 683 Sixth avenue, and formed the Feature Film Protective Association, the first organization of its kind in the country.

The members of the Feature Film Renters Association are combining their forces for the purpose of improving the moving picture business in various respects.

"We plan to do several things," says Moe Streimer, the president. "We are going to get after bad accounts. But that is not our main purpose. We want more good features, real features. To induce the manufacturers to make them we intend to offer more money. Instead of buying mediocre features at ten or twelve cents a foot, we take the stand that we want good features and are willing to pay fifteen cents a foot or as high as twenty cents if they are worth the money. We will also plan ways and means of protection against unreliable film men, 'pirates' and 'dupers' especially. The attendance at the first meeting was most flattering. Nearly all the feature buying firms in New York City were represented and enrolled as members. At the next meeting it is expected that they will all come in."

The following are the officers of the association: President, Moe Streimer, Theatre Film Company; vice-president, Murray Bier, Emby. Feature Film Company; secretary, William Weisfold, Advance Feature Film Company, and treasurer, Mr. Cohen, of the Feature Film Company.

THE firms enrolled in the Feature Film Protective Association are:

Theatre Film Company, Inc.; World Special Film Corporation; Warners' Features, Inc.; Advance Feature Film Company, Inc.; Regal Feature Film Company, Eagle Feature Film Company, Sedeg Feature Film Company, Emby Feature Film Company, Ideal Feature Film Company, Richter Feature Films Company, North American Feature Film Company, Exclusive Feature Film Company, Eastern Feature Film Company, Unique Feature Film Company, Fidelity Feature Film Company, Special Feature Film Company, Feature Film Company, Royal Feature, Film Company, Vita Feature Film Company, Savoy Feature Film Company, and Weinberg's Feature Film Company.

PATENTS SUIT CONTINUES

Defense Piles Up Evidence Showing Improvement in Trade Conditions Since 1908

MUCH testimony along routine lines was piled up during the week by the defense in the Federal suit against the Motion Picture Patents Company as a trust under the Sherman anti-trust law. The majority of the witnesses were managers of General Film Company branch exchanges. They all testified as to the unsettled and chaotic conditions in the motion-picture business prior to 1908 and the vastly superior condition at the present time. Several of the number, who had owned exchanges which the General Film bought out, expressed themselves as pleased with the sales.

One interesting development, but one which has no direct bearing on the case, is the announcement that Edward P. Grosvenor, special assistant to Attorney-General McReynolds, the man who has been in charge of the prosecution, and Joseph P. Darling, special agent of the Department of Justice, a lawyer himself and the man who worked up the evidence, will resign from the Government service as soon as the Patents Company cases are ended. There is no dissatisfaction. Both men will go into private practice in New York. The move has no special significance as men are continually leaving the Government service when an opportunity to better themselves presents itself.

It is expected that the hearings in New York will be wound up in a week or two. Then hearings will be held in the Middle West. These are expected to be concluded by the first of February. Then both sides will take their time in preparing briefs after which the case will be argued before the District Court of the United States for Eastern Pennsylvania. When the decision will be handed down is problematical. It may be the week after the briefs go in. It may not come through till next fall.

Two witnesses were heard Monday morning. Albert J. Gilligham, of 60 Virginia avenue, Detroit, manager of the Detroit branch of the General Film Company, was the first witness. He was formerly associated as treasurer in the National Vaudette Film Company with Emanuel Mandelbaum, Philip Gleichman and Jacob Diener. The General Film Company bought the National Vaudette Film Company for $60,000.

Ike Van Runkel, manager of the American, Wabash and City Hall branches of the General Film Company, in Chicago, came next. He was formerly treasurer of the American Film Service, which was sold to the General Film for $49,500.

LASKY AND DE MILLE ENTER PICTURE FIELD

Company is Incorporated in New York State to Produce Famous Plays and Novels on the Ground Where the Action Was Supposed to Have Occurred—"The Squaw Man" Will Be Their Initial Feature

A RUMOR which has been going the rounds in motion picture circles for the past eight months to the effect that Jesse L. Lasky, the well-known theatrical producer, was to enter the realm of the film is at last an accomplished fact. A statement issued at the Lasky offices in the Longacre Theatre late this week confirmed these reports and announced that the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Motion Picture Company, incorporated under the laws of the state of New York, would in future be devoted to the production of famous plays and novels in film form. The announcement also said that several men prominent in the theatrical and motion-picture world would be associated with Mr. Lasky in the new company.

Jesse L. Lasky, perhaps best known as the creator of the famous Folies Bergere and the producer of many important vaudeville acts, is the president and guiding star of the new organization and will have charge of the numerous details connected with the enterprise. Associated with him will be men of distinction and note in the amusement field.

NOTABLE among these will be Cecil De Mille, for the past few years associated with David Belasco, both as a playwright and as a stage director. Mr. De Mille has already collaborated with Mr. Lasky in several dramatic triumphs and will act as general stage director in charge of all the productions of the new company.

Mr. De Mille's activities were confined exclusively to the drama, but since the Jesse L. Lasky Company was first spoken of he has been an ardent student of the screen drama and is now a full-fledged believer in the motion photo play. As an aide and first-hand assistant, Mr. De Mille will have Oscar Apfel, the former Pathe director, who has been turning out features for Reliance and Majestic and before that with the Edison Company. Mr. Apfel will be associated with Mr. De Mille in all productions under taken by the Jesse L. Lasky organization management.

JESSE L. LASKY

The officers of the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Motion Picture Company are as follows: Jesse L. Lasky, president; Cecil De Mille, general stage director; Samuel Goldfish, treasurer and business manager, and Frank A. Tichenor, general sales manager. Mr. Goldfish will have complete charge of the commercial end of the Lasky organization.

Frank A. Tichenor, who is in charge of the sales department of the new company, was for a time the head of the Manhattan Slide and Film Company and, in consequence, is known to many in the motion-picture trade. As chairman of the Motion Picture Exhibition and Convention at the Grand Central Palace he greatly enlarged his circle of acquaintances and gained many friends.

THE policy of the Jesse L. Lasky Company will be the adaptation of famous novels and plays for presentation on the screen, using as a background the precise locality where the action of the play or novel was supposed to have occurred. Contracts have already been made with Edward Milton Royle and the new company's first production will be "The Squaw Man," the drama in which Dustin Farnum starred. Mr. Farnum has been engaged to play the leading rôle for the Lasky company and as many of the original cast as can be secured will be utilized in the coming production.

Mr. Royle, accompanied by Cecil De Mille and Dustin Farnum, are now in the West in search of the exact spot upon which Mr. Royle based the action of his drama. Mr. Lasky as yet has been unable to announce the names of the cast which will support Mr. Farnum, but it is expected he will do so in the near future.

The mere announcement of the formation of the new concern and the character of its coming productions has resulted in many requests for territorial rights.

A PLEA FOR EDUCATIONAL SUBJECTS

"THE application of the Motion Picture to Educational Purposes" is the title of a paper recently delivered before the Photographic Society of Philadelphia by Henry Leffmann. Mr. Leffmann gives a practical exposition of some of the ways in which motion pictures can be an almost invaluable aid to instruction in various lines. His paper follows:

"The development of efficiency in motion picture apparatus has been due, as in almost all other cases of progress, to the labors of many workers, only a few of whom have received full pecuniary reward for their services. So far as can be at present asserted on published evidence, the first person to show motion pictures on a screen was Mr. H. R. Heyl, of Philadelphia, who, at a public lecture in 1870 under the auspices of the Franklin Institute, showed pictures of a waltzing couple, these being from negatives taken from the original moving figures.

"Muybridge's work is well known. It was obtained by a very complex and expensive set of cameras, but was of great importance in showing the error of the ordinary representations of animals in motion. The child's toy is also well known. It is probably very ancient, as Mr. Jenkins, of Washington, D. C., has pointed out lines in Lucretius' poem 'On the Nature of Things' that indicate that such apparatus was known at that date, the first century of the common era.

"It seems to me that concerted effort should be made by educators to secure facilities for the making and exhibiting of films for the many forms of educational work for which the art is so well adapted. Those that are occasionally shown of growing plants, moving animals, microscopic or otherwise, are usually interesting, but as a general thing, in these the scientific value is sacrificed to the dramatic effect, and one is not always sure that some of the results are not faked. The educational use that should be made is, for example, to show: movements of ameba and infusoria, circulation of the cell-contents in plants, movements of nuclear structures.

"AS the camera can be so operated that exposures can be made at any interval, and subsequently the positive film can be run at high speed, it is possible to exhibit to a class some of the very slow processes of cell-action in rapid demonstration. Moreover, since a teacher may often search for a long while to secure a vivid demonstration of some biologic action, it is possible when such has been obtained to secure a permanent record of it.

"Not the least of the scientific application of the motion picture camera is the preservation of public occurrences. It is greatly to be desired that the authorities of our large cities should establish a department for obtaining films of every important parade or other public event, and should preserve the same with care, so that in later years it would be possible to show the residents of the city how their ancestors celebrated.

"Some progress has recently been made in the application of the method to the recording of symptoms of disease, but although these films are praiseworthy and have been received with much approval of physicians, yet it appears that they have been obtained only by the sufferance of one of the great film-making firms, and that control over the films is retained by the makers. The need is for a free sale of films and of all apparatus for making and exhibiting them.

"The papers have recently contained a statement that under the threat of immediate prosecution a company that has monopolized much of the photographic supply business has said, 'Don't shoot, Davy, I'll come down,' and it is likely that if the powerful educational institutions of the country would enter on a vigorous campaign, the interferences that still exist in the application of motion pictures to classroom work will be removed, and it will be possible for educators to obtain films at reasonable rates and use them without any restrictions other than those relating to fire hazard.

"Several cameras and exhibition machines have been devised for the use of films of other than standard size, but these do not meet fully the requirements, as the standard film is likely to be manufactured in larger quantity and of better quality, and it will be much better for all if but one size is in vogue.

"AS an instance of the value of cinematographic study of animal motion, I may mention some results obtained by Dr. Samuel C. Schmucker and myself. A garter snake, eighteen inches long, was marked with white, narrow, transverse stripes, about six inches apart, and was then allowed to move over a cross-lined area of moderate size. The study of the pictures taken at the rate of about fourteen per second showed that each part of the snake's body moved over a different point in the field, that is, that the motion was not like that of a railroad train, with which all parts go over the same track, but each part of body pursues an independent set of curves.

"Among the lines of study that might be pursued is investigation of the details of explosions. A good deal of photography has been done, it is true, on such incidents, but it is almost entirely limited to a single picture, showing only one moment of the phenomenon and giving no idea of detail."

THREE KEYSTONES A WEEK COMING

Beginning December 15th, the Keystone Company, a subsidiary of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, will release three comedies a week on the Mutual program. These will come Tuesdays, Thursdays and Saturdays.

In addition, one multiple-reel comedy will be issued a month. These will be specials. The first of these is "Zuzu, the Band Leader," with Mabel Normand and Ford Sterling. Next will come "Baffles, the Gentleman Burglar."

PHILADELPHIA EXHIBITORS MEET

News and Notes of Motion Picture Activities in the Quaker City and Vicinity

THE Philadelphia Local of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of Pennsylvania held an open meeting at their headquarters in the Parkway Building, Philadelphia, recently but owing to the inclement weather, the meeting was not as well attended as had been expected.

Among the speakers were Mr. Benn, of the Benn chain of theatres; Dr. H. B. F. Cristion, Mr. Samuel F. Wheeler, Mr. M. J. Walsh, the treasurer, and Mr. C. M. Rappaport.

Mr. Benn spoke at length explaining how he managed to get a ten-cent price when his competitor only received five cents admission, and how now he gets ten and twenty cents at some of his theatres. He has cut out vaudeville, singers, and the excessive number of reels, and instead gives a short program of single reels properly projected in a spotlessly clean theatre. He uses no deodorizers but depends entirely on fresh air.

Mr. Wheeler spoke at length on the methods of dealing with the municipal and state authorities, and spoke of the unfairness of the local officials in many cases. The other speakers spoke along similar lines, but all urged a better and stronger organization.

The meeting was not adjourned but carried over until the regular Friday session, which will be conducted as an open meeting. The local meets every Friday at 2 p.m. in the Parkway Building, Broad and Race streets, Philadelphia.

Mr. Bush's speech against censorship was heartily applauded.

Ben Abrams, formerly of Warner's, says he intends to remain in Philadelphia, and expects to spring a surprise soon in the line of four and five-reel features.

Mr. Eaton has sold the Midget Bijou, at Fifty-second and Chestnut streets, Philadelphia, to Isadore Finkelman, and is now on the market for a 3,000 capacity theatre.

Clarence G. Powell has been secured by the owners of the New Eureka Theatre, Fortieth and Market streets, Philadelphia, to act as manager. Mr. Powell is well known and extremely popular in the theatrical profession, having for the past ten years been identified with it as owner, lessee and manager of various successful enterprises. He was formerly manager of the Wildwood Ocean Pier, at Wildwood, N. J.

The new theatre is to be one of the handsomest in Philadelphia, devoted to first run and exclusive feature pictures only. A ten-cent admission will be charged.

J. Delmar, for many years the popular live wire manager of the Cayuga Theatre, Philadelphia, announces that he has severed his connections with that theatre, and is temporarily released from all contracts.

From all accounts, up to date the first week's business of G. D. Briggs Jr., the new manager of Warner's features, has more than warranted the increase in their bookings.

C. Campbell, of the American Features, has been busy booking through Pennsylvania, and will return to Philadelphia, shortly.

Chas. Thropp, general manager of Nixon-Erlanger houses, Philadelphia, is the candidate of the Sixtieth and Market Streets Business Men's Association for president.

Barris-Nathan Company report the consummation of several large picture theatre deals on theatres located in Philadelphia. They are very optimistic regarding the motion picture business in general, and declare that business was never so brisk as it is today.

David Barris expects his book on motion picture theatre management to be off the press shortly. Although confined to 100 pages, it covers the subject thoroughly and should prove a great help to those with experience as well as those just entering the business. It is to be published by the Rialto Press.

E. J. O'Keefe, of the City Square Theatre, Atlantic City, reported that the exhibitors of that city have organized an exhibitors' league.

OSHKOSH CONVENTION COMMITTEE

These five members of the Wisconsin branch of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America will have charge of the coming Wisconsin state convention to be held in Oshkosh on December 16 and 17, 1913. From left to right they are: N. J. Houze, Charles Porter, John R. Ek, chairman, Jesse Hogan and Arthur Grey.

PICTURE THEATRES AND OTHERS

THE new art of photoplay offers the widest latitude for the playwright and the producer in an appeal universal for the people. In its primitive stages many things flashed into photoplay that sense and censorship have since eliminated, but it is now finding itself as a big, fixed and important form of art. The pessimists have long ceased to prate about the doom of motion pictures, to denounce them in general terms for isolated individual offences and to sniff at them simply because they were an amusement within the reach of the most modest purse.

This new form of amusement, however, has dealt a telling blow at the arbitrary powers controlling the destinies of the nation's theatres. The prohibitive prices that once were asked for the artificial stuff that was parading on the stage as real have been reduced to a more reasonable basis, and it is generally considered that the character of the entertainment has been bettered by a competition once scorned as unworthy of notice.

It is now pretty definitely determined that the new form of entertainment has a very close relation with the old one, and the former is drawing upon the latter for its sinews of talent in histrionic and producing forces. Many an actor, who once sneered at motion pictures as a thing beneath contempt, has come to regard them with a respect born of positive profit—something that may eliminate the drudgery of one-night stands and the old time business "bunk" with which most of them were sadly familiar.

IT has in a similar measure interested the powers of contemporary fiction to provide mediums of expression, so that distinguished writers are adapting their pens to the new forms fitting the silent drama. Pantomime is the oldest art of the world and its rejuvenation in motion pictures indicates its potentiality and its artistic growth upon the widest scale the world has ever witnessed. Not only has this new factor in the field of amusement shown steady growth in every detail of service, but it submits as an enlightened art to a censorship that it is hoped will give it wholesome advantages and make it distinctive over every form of art that deserves to triumph in the esteem of the present and future generations.

As the service of its supply has bettered and progressed, the character of its environment has improved so that the patronizing public gets more comfort and more security than ever before for a cheap tariff. Architectural forms have been adapting themselves to these requirements very adroitly and while the demands of city boards in calls for safety and for sanitary regulations occasionally appear arbitrary and exacting, they are all for the best. They add to the protection of the patron and æsthetically serve to keep up with the advanced comforts of the age without adding to the high cost of living.

A recent issue of The Motion Picture News devoted to motion pictures had an interesting series of designs showing the modern habitations for this class of amusement. These index better than anything else could the demand of the day for secure, sanitary and attractive surroundings, in association with the showing of pictures that all through indicate a betterment of workmanship and improvement of ideals in an entertainment that is beyond compare, touching as it does the relaxation hours of people all over the world.

EXECUTIVE BOARD OF M. P. E. A. OF NEW YORK STATE, WHO WILL MEET AT THE HOTEL IMPERIAL ON MONDAY

LATEST NEWS FROM CHICAGO

Fulton Installs Wurlitzer Orchestrion

THE latest move of E. E. Fulton, the progressive Chicago dealer and jobber in motion picture theatre and projection equipment, is to install a Wurlitzer Motion Picture Orchestrion in his private exhibition-room. This room is built and equipped as a regular theatre, having a theatre-appearing front; regular opera chairs, seating 142 persons; a shadow-box around a screen, on which two pictures can be shown at one and the same time if desired; on up-to-date fireproof operating booth, built of pyrobar, asbestos and iron, in which are installed three latest motor-driven machines; a Power, Simplex and Motiograph, various transformers, economizers and meters. The architecture of this private theatre is mission, plastic and metal construction, nicely laid out and with correct color effects, which gives one an idea for the application of the materials and supplies handled by Mr. Fulton.

This theatre is used on Wednesdays by Mr. Fulton to exhibit the advance releases of the films which he represents in Chicago—Lubin and Patheplay.

W. R. Rothacker—Commuter

W. R. Rothacker, general manager of the Industrial Moving Picture Co., left Chicago on Sunday via the Twentieth Century for New York City. He is listed as a commuter, as it would take a daily paper to chronicle his trips fore and back from New York City. Before the purchase of the Anti-Trust and Standard exchanges, Claude Plough and Joseph Hopp held the record for flying trips between Chicago and New York. Chicago must possess one commuter, so the title passes on to Rothacker.

General Feature Increases Releases

The General Feature Film Company of Chicago has made arrangements whereby it will release seven pictures a week. This progressive concern, which is guided by William Hershberg and Mr. Spencer, recently bought out the M. & F. Feature Exchange; since that time they have added several more of the leading brands to their program and the latest announcement is that it will put out a feature a day.

Heinze Takes Over South Bend Theatre

George Heinze, one of Chicago's oldest and foremost exhibitors, has closed a deal whereby he will take over the Auditorium Theatre in South Bend, Ind. This theatre was formerly controlled by Klaw & Erlanger and seats 1,500 people. Mr. Heinze was the owner of several of the finest motion picture theatres that Chicago possesses, two of them being located in the aristocratic suburb of Oak Park.

Bushman Campaigning

Francis X. Bushman, leading man of the Essanay pictures, is busy campaigning in the various motion picture theatres of Chicago. With the co-operation of the publicity department, under the personal direction of Don Meaney, a large portion of the theatres have been visited. It is the intention of Mr. Meaney to visit the nearby cities within a radius of three hundred miles of Chicago.

On these campaigns Mr. Bushman gives a short talk on the making of the picture. The exhibitors of Chicago are clamoring for Mr. Bushman at their theatres, and those theatres he has already visited claim him the biggest drawing power they have ever played. Mr. Bushman will travel out of Chicago as soon as he has visited all the theatres of the Windy City. Special posters of Mr. Bushman are being supplied, announcing his coming at the theatres.

Operators' Union Secures New Quarters

The Motion Picture Operators' Union of Chicago has made arrangements whereby it will occupy the quarters which formerly housed the White Rats. These clubrooms were at one time the headquarters of the Press Club of Chicago, and contain many conveniences for the pleasure of its members. There are pool and billiard tables, bowling-alleys, card-rooms, banquet-hall, executive-rooms and reading-rooms. These quarters occupy two floors and are ideal rooms for a big body such as the Operators' Union.

Union Film Company Elects Officers

After moving into its new quarters on the bank floor of the Mortimer Building, the Union Film Company elected its officers. They are: William Hopp, president; William F. Wreden, secretary; Joseph Hopp, treasurer, and Carl Harthill, general manager. This concern is now releasing a feature a day and is buying the entire output of the Exclusive Supply Company. It is said that this company is the first to book an independent feature in the Orpheum Theatre, on State street, one of Chicago's most prosperous theatres. William Hopp, who has been ill for the past month, is again on the job directing things at the Union Film Company's headquarters.

Notes

Max Green, who has been conducting the Lincoln Theatre, on North Clark and Division streets, for the past few years, claims splendid business, due, he states, to the high-class manner in which he runs his theatre. Mr. Green is a progressive exhibitor and always the first to use the more modern things which are continually coming into the business.

Amongst the visitors in Chicago this week are J. A. Berst and Stanly Twist on the register. Stan is on his way to Australia, but Mr. Berst does not divulge his plans.

DISTINGUISHED VISITORS AT ESSANAY STUDIO

Many distinguished and prominent people visited the Essanay Chicago studio during the past week Among the most noted, perhaps, was Mayor "Lew" Shank of Indianapolis. His surprise at the progress of the motion picture industry and the interesting and novel way in which the pictures are taken was genuine. John Hymes, of Hymes and McIntyre, now playing in "When Dreams Come True," and several others who request that their names be not mentioned, also visited the plant.

FILM COMPANY OF DELAWARE STARTS

The Film Company of Delaware, a new concern, has purchased the plant of the New York Motor Works Company, at East Nutley, N. J., for $150,000, and expects to start operations soon. The new concern will manufacture motion picture theatre accessories and equipment. It is expected to employ 1,000 hands. The recently acquired plant is located on a plot of several hundred acres and is on a spur track of the Erie Railroad.

NEW THEATRE FOR PADUCAH, KY.

Paducah, Ky., is to have a new motion picture theatre of the most modern type. Rodney C. Davis, proprietor and manager of the Kozy Theatre, at 417 Broadway, will erect the new building on the site now occupied by the Kozy. Rankin Kirkland, assistant cashier of the City National Bank of Paducah, will be associated with Mr. Davis in the venture.

Before building the theatre, Mr. Davis is making a tour of the Middle West and South in search of practical ideas. The present Kozy is twenty by ninety feet and seats 240. The new theatre will be twenty-six by 150 feet and seat 500. A pipe organ will be installed. The Paducah papers have been loud in their praise of the new enterprise and the men connected with it.

MOTION PICTURES DEVELOP QUICK THINKERS

BY H. E. AITKEN

SO much has been said about the effects, both good and evil, of motion pictures upon children, that the following discussion of the subject by President H. E. Aitken, of the Mutual Film Corporation, is of particular interest at this time.

Mr. Aitken approaches the subject from rather a different angle than that used by the majority of people who have seen fit to express their opinion. If his theory is correct, even to a small degree, the rising generation of picture fans stand to revolutionize the arts and sciences.

"The very first training the pictures give to a child," suggests Mr. Aitken, "is also the most necessary to its success in any walk of life in which it may be thrown. That is "application." Gradually and unknowingly the child learns to sit in a chair with its attention riveted upon constantly changing pictures for many minutes at a stretch. Thus, without realizing the fact, the child learns what will be the very foundation of its future knowledge and success. Not only does it learn to apply itself to the subject in hand, but concentration is developed to a high degree, owing to the fact that a single glance away from the screen is accompanied by an immediate loss in the shape of rapidly changing scenes which are not supplemented by any words that can supply a substitute thought, by way of the ear-door to the brain.

"But, as important as the power of concentration is acknowledged to be in the scheme of educational development, it seems to me that we can expect of motion pictures an even greater boon, from the standpoint of training the youthful mind and also of improving the thinking power of adults.

FEW laymen realize the amount of material or "meat" that is contained in an ordinary photoplay. For instance, the usual four-act drama that furnishes a full evening's entertainment in our theatres is told in pictures in a few minutes. The result is that the person watching a motion picture drama thinks many times faster than the one witnessing an ordinary drama. Not only do events follow each other in rapid succession upon the screen but the mind must, in addition to taking cognizance of the action presented, also supply the thoughts that actuate the movements of the different characters as well as the effects of the dramatic situations upon their future behavior.

"Every scene presented must be closely followed and thoroughly appreciated at the same rate of speed that it is flashed upon the curtain. Gradually the mind of the child picture-theatre goer is trained to work at a pace that was unknown in the pre-cinematographic age—if you will pardon the coined word—and who can say to what state of perfection this quality of rapid thinking will be developed in the coming generation of picture viewers.

"There is no doubt in my mind that the reason why many are won over to picture-going only after several years of effort is due to the fact that the average brain is not yet trained to grasp enough of the real significance of the dramatic action presented to make the moving picture sufficiently interesting.

"The possibilities of the human mind trained to an unknown point of perfection by an agency that was not discovered until a few short years ago presents a new line of thought that is well worthy of consideration by all persons who think."

Pictures Invade China

American Materials and Supplies in Demand in Celestial Kingdom

THAT China is rapidly becoming a fertile field for the exploitation of motion pictures is evidenced by an article appearing in the Daily Consular and Trade Reports, written by George E. Anderson, United States Consul-General at Hongkong.

A company has been formed in Hongkong, says Mr. Anderson, with sufficient capital to furnish the native population in Chinese cities with motion picture entertainments having descriptive matter and other features in Chinese. There are already fairly successful cinematograph establishments in Hongkong, Shanghai, and other Chinese open ports and even in some of the smaller ports, but the films used are foreign films with foreign descriptive matter. The new company is establishing its first theater in Yaumati, one of the suburban centers of Hongkong, with two machines, one American and one Italian, and 500 films, most of which are American films with Chinese adaptation. The company has three Chinese and four European directors.

That there is a field for expansion in the cinematograph business seems to be beyond doubt; but because of the necessity of adapting foreign films to Chinese audiences and because of other difficulties, such as transport and theatre arrangements in native cities, it is practically necessary to enlist Chinese capital and more or less Chinese management in the business.

These are difficult to obtain in connection with an adequate experience in the motion picture business. American materials and supplies and American machines stand well in this part of the world, and American cinematograph methods are coming more and more into vogue. Continuous performance establishments are becoming popular.

Hongkong, by reason of its central situation and transportation connections, has come to be quite an exchange center in film distribution. There are several concerns in the port at the present time doing business solely in motion picture films, mostly on an exchange or rental business; and they serve cities all over this part of the world, notably in the Philippines, Indo-China and the Malay States, Siam, Burma, and North China.

The names of these concerns and that of the new cinematograph company may be obtained from the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, Washington, D. C.

AMMEX PLAYERS INVADE MEXICO

Although Mexico is hardly a healthy or a restful country at this time, the Ammex Company will chance stray bullets and will produce a three-reel Mexican military drama on the dark and bloody ground beyond the Rio Grande. The scenario of this drama was written by Grace Adele Pierce, who has been regularly engaged to write the Ammex scenarios in future.

Miss Pierce is widely known as a scenario writer. "Judith," the Biograph feature, and one of the last pictures of D. W. Griffith at the Biograph studio, is a child of her brain.

MOTION PICTURES TO EDUCATE THE FARMER

United States Government Will Become a Manufacturer, Distributor and Exhibitor of Films

THROUGH the Department of Agriculture, through its bureau of rural organization service, the United States Government has established a school of motion pictures illustrating agricultural methods and become at once a manufacturer, distributor and exhibitor of films. This is what the Rural Organization Service may be termed, which was recently inaugurated with Dr. T. N. Carver as director.

It is known that the government has made use of animated views at conventions and expositions, but these have only been intermittent as circumstances demanded. It is also known that the Bureau of Animal Industry and Office of Public Roads have circulated films among the farmers as a means of instruction and suggestion, but not until now has a channel for a continuous output of the motion pictures of the department been possible. The use of the camera exhibition is but a part of the broad work planned by the Rural Organization Service, but there is little doubt that this will do much to attract the farmers to the more serious sides of agriculture.

One of the features of the Rural Organization Service is to teach the farmers by motion pictures the various lessons of the farm, the stock yards, the dairy, the forest and the many other fields in which their interests lie. Clyde L. Davis and Roger E. Treat have been appointed special agents to make the initial circulation of the films in the rural districts. It is their intention to visit the highways and byways, to show neglected farmers and those on neglected farms how to improve themselves, their lands and their crops. This is the most up-to-date, practical and thoroughly popular course in agriculture that the department has yet attempted.

THE launching of the Rural Organization Service has caused an additional incentive in each bureau and division to put its best work in animated form, wherever it is found possible. The various bureau chiefs have promised co-operation and their photographic laboratories will in future bend their efforts towards ribbon negatives for themselves and this service. This movement has come as a most excellent means of testing the efficiency of the motion picture as an educator.

The South is the first field in which operations have been opened with the most sanguine success as an outlook. Probably nothing has ever made the laggard, the ignorant, and the proud man of wealth stop to think, as has the motion picture. It may be called the spirit of the age, which has been caught up in all fields of human endeavor. It is the common meeting ground for all classes and needs no particular language for its interpretation. It is a significant fact that the spectator takes away from a motion picture show many suggestions and often makes practical use of them without realizing that this was the primary intent of the film.

In the past the field experts of the government have had discouraging experiences in making their points clear by mere words or by the stereoptican. This inherent defect will be overcome by the animated views. Besides, the farmers will have the opportunity of seeing a truth or a principle logically worked out from start to finish without having to undergo the trouble and expense of the experiment themselves.

The "show me" element forms a large part of the make-up of the tiller of the soil. Consequently, there is every reason why the government should employ the most up-to-the-minute manner of presenting its experiments to the agricultural public.

At the present time the Bureau of Animal Industry has perhaps the largest collection of films and through the co-operation of Chief Melvin and his photographer, Joseph Abel, the field experts of the Rural Service were able to begin their tour without delay. Among the subjects that are now being shown by the field experts is "The Texas Tick," with a detailed study of the tick itself and a series of experiments for the eradication of the pest as well as a graphic exhibition of the methods for its prevention. This will be most beneficial to the South, as the methods used and suggested have been proved a success by the Bureau of Animal Industry, which has succeeded in making some badly infested districts tick-free.

ROAD BUILDING AS SHOWN BY OFFICE OF PUBLIC ROADS

ANOTHER interesting film is the "Cattle Industry of the South," which includes views of existing conditions, accentuating improvements in some instances and commending the excellent care of the cattle in others. Aside from this being an instructive story, it is also pretty and entertaining, as many of the settings are in the picturesque and naturally charming rural sections of the South. Still another motion picture gives instructions to the stock-raiser. This is called the "Importation and Exportation of Livestock." It depicts the inspection of cattle on leaving and entering our ports to prevent the carrying of diseases. Farmers will welcome a knowledge of this side of animal husbandry, as well as the opportunity to note the sanitary precautions exercised during transportation to and from the quarantine stations, the excellent barns at these stations and the consideration given the four-footed passengers on the steamer.

The Office of Public Roads also has some films to offer the Rural Service. These show methods of road-building with various kinds of material, as well as the ways of repairing old roads with the idea of the greatest durability. This includes some views of our bad roads with the dilemma of being "stuck in the mud."

Good roads have become a necessity to-day with the advent of the automobile as a common means of transportation of farm products and pleasant travel in rural districts. It will therefore interest the farmers to know how to build and maintain their public highways. Some scientific views also form a part of the exhibition to be offered by the field experts of the government.

The officials of the Rural Service are most enthusiastic over the results already attained in teaching agriculture by motion pictures. Interviewing those connected with the work brought forth these statements: "We feel confident of the success of our new departure. People of limited education are met on a ground within the scope of their understanding and are entertained, while the remarks which supplement the pictures add to their fuller knowledge of the subject shown. We expect crowded houses everywhere, and no doubt in some towns we will be the first in the field.

HOW CATTLE ARE SHIPPED

The government is doing a wise thing in establishing a motion picture school of agriculture."

T. J. West Talks on Conditions Here

Famous British Showman Pleased by Developments in Picture Art

T. J. WEST, the well-known English film man, who is noted for his deep knowledge and wide experience of showmanship, has just returned to England after a visit to Australia and a tour of the United States and other countries. During this time Mr. West made a study of the motion picture industry in the various countries which he passed through, and his observations on conditions in this country have unusual interest, especially from the exhibitor's standpoint.

Mr. West, who stopped in the United States on his way to Australia, spent some time here and met many of the leaders in the motion picture industry. In a recent interview, obtained immediately after his return to England, he gave some of the conclusions he had reached relative to the industry here.

"In New York, Chicago and other cities," said Mr. West, "I met many of the principal people in the motion picture trade and had an opportunity to gage the wonderful developments which had taken place since I was there before. In the picture theatres, vaudeville is being gradually eliminated, better orchestras being provided in its place, with the result that business, from the exhibitor's point of view, has greatly improved.

"I always did contend that American exhibitors began at the wrong end by charging five or ten cents for admission, as though their entertainments were only of small worth—which is very different from what I did in Australia. Having proved, however, that in Australia I could get three shillings, two shillings and one shilling, they evidently saw that it was better to eliminate cheap vaudeville, get better orchestras and better projection, and run their shows altogether on a higher plane.

"At the Astor Theatre, New York, for instance, 'Quo Vadis?' had a solid run of twenty-two weeks at prices ranging from twenty-five cents to one dollar, and then it was only taken off to make room for other plays previously booked. And I understand from Mr. Kleine that it is still running at another theatre."

FAREWELL DINNER TO BRANDT

A number of English newspapermen and members of the Trans-Atlantic Film Company, which was recently formed to handle the Universal productions in Great Britain, gave a farewell dinner in London to Joe Brandt, the Trans-Atlantic's publicity manager, on the eve of his departure for America.

The dinner, which was held at the Boulogne restaurant, Corrard Street, London, W. C., was a great success and brought forth many tributes to Mr. Brandt. John D. Tippetts and J. Avery, of the Trans-Atlantic Company, took turns in the chair, while Lewis Roach, who will take Mr. Brandt's place as publicity manager and editor of the Trans-Atlantic Company's publications, proposed the toast to the departing guest.

Among those present were Charles Lane, of the Exchange Telegraph Company and Lloyd's News; Oscar Rosenberg and Horace J. Simpson, of Shuroy's publications; L. Pounds, Evening News; Mr. Watson, Kinematograph Weekly; Messrs. Hoyes and Parrott, the Bioscope; S. W. Fredman, the Cinema; J. H. Davies, F. W. Taylor, Clarence Hunt, Mr. Catlin, S. Kennard, C. B. Betting, L. A. Harrap, A. Henderson and J. E. Pryde-Hughes.

J. H. HALLBERG MOVES INTO LARGER QUARTERS

J. H. Hallberg, the motion picture supply man, has taken the whole floor at 36 East Twenty-third street, the change being necessitated by the growth of his business. Mr. Hallberg says that the Hallberg A. C. to D. C. economizer is giving satisfaction wherever used. To prove his point he cites the following letter which he received recently:

"Newburgh, N. Y.

"Dear Sir:

"The Kinemacolor service starts to-day, and judging from the many favorable comments on the Panama Canal pictures, they should make a big hit. "Hallberg" A. C. to D. C. Economizer is a wonder. It worked perfectly from the start and we do not have to use but one-half of the current it produces. The black and white pictures we showed for two days were the talk of the town. The operators said the pictures in Poughkeepsie and Newburgh were the best they had ever seen and we both use the "Hallberg" A. C. to D. C. Economizer.

"Yours very truly,
"F. M. TAYLOR,
"Academy of Music."

SUCCESSFUL EXHIBITING

BY WALTER ROSENBERG

EDITOR'S NOTE.—As the manager and lessee of many motion picture theatres, Mr. Rosenberg may be said to speak with the authority that is the attribute of success. Among the motion picture houses under Mr. Rosenberg's supervision are the following: Savoy Theatre, New York; Metropolis Theatre, New York; Savoy Theatre, Mt. Vernon; Savoy Theatre, Asbury Park, N. J.; Broadway Theatre, Long Branch, and Hoyt's Theatre, South Norwalk, Conn.

AS lessee and manager of a number of theatres in New York and elsewhere, I have met with much experience that I believe may be of material help to brother exhibitors, who have not had a chance to have a similar amount of experience. It is not the intention of this article to criticise any of the methods in vogue by my contemporaries, rather, it is designed to be a help to those exhibitors who feel that their methods can be improved and are willing to take the advice of one who for a number of years has been actively engaged in the business of procuring entertainment for the public.

It seems to me that next in importance to the necessity of having the best pictures possible, comes polite and ingenious service. An impolite usher or employee who is not thoughtful can do more to injure the business of his employer than even poor pictures would do. None of us, of course, wish to slight any of our employees. By slighting I mean that every exhibitor believes it is better to have happy and well-satisfied employees than to have those who have cause to be disgruntled.

Personally, I do not believe it is necessary to have a large number of ushers. Even in our large New York theatre, The Savoy, we have but one usher with an assistant when necessary. This girl, Miss Margaret Browning, is, perhaps, the best paid and most capable woman employee in any theatre in New York. For this reason we are able to get the very best service possible from her. Her attention to the patrons of the theatre has been remarked many times, and the people appreciate even in a cheap-priced house the little attentions that a thoughtful person may give them, such as escorting to seats, helping them on and off with their overcoats, answering their questions, however foolish, and the thorough-going courtesy extended to everyone who comes into the theatre.

IT has been our experience with girl ushers that many are afraid, that if a strange man should address them their replies are apt to be in the tone of one resenting an insult, whereas there is a great likelihood of the questioner desiring nothing but information, with which only the person addressed could supply them.

Good and capable projection is a most important item. By projection I mean everything that belongs to the projector's room. If you have a motor-driven machine, or if the machine is hand-driven, it is absolutely necessary that a capable and licensed man shall be in charge. This man must be paid well, twelve dollars per week not being a salary sufficient to obtain and retain such a man. This man must understand fully the running of films in order not to hurt them. He must be a thorough electrician and should have a capable apprentice to help him in winding and arranging the reels, so that no time is lost.

A mighty good device which we have worked to considerable advantage in all of our theatres is the plan of having the signs thrown on the screen from time to time, telling the patrons things that it is necessary for them to know, such as the location of the ladies' and gentlemen's resting rooms, the program for the following day, and the various things of importance which they wish to know. Of course this plan may be overworked or underworked. Too many signs, posters, etc., are an injury and will really hurt a theatre's business.

Posters in front of the house should always be in frames, good brass frames with glass fronts, and very few of them. There should be just enough of them to show the transient trade that there is a motion picture house in the rear of those signs. To place posters all over the front of the lobby is a very poor advertisement. It might attract a very commonplace class of patrons, but it will not attract the class of people that you wish to have visit your house.

A CLOCK on the stage will be found to be appreciated by the audience. In the semi-light prevailing in so many theatres it is rather hard to see the time, and a good large clock is really a drawing card, or at least so we have found it. The timepiece used in our Savoy theatre in New York City is a large, white sheet on which the time is thrown by an electric clock in the orchestra. The workings are most mysterious and keep the audience continually guessing how it operates. But it is accurate, can be easily seen, and is far better than throwing the time on a stencil on the screen as often as the operator sees fit.

There are always a number of patrons who come into a theatre just to pass away a certain length of time before keeping an appointment. These people want to be kept constantly informed of the time and how long they have to stay. For this reason they will greatly appreciate an attention of this kind.

Another thing that comes under the head of attention to patrons is the condition of the private rooms in a theatre. The ladies' room in particular should be kept scrupulously clean and dainty. There should be at least one matron in constant attendance and every possible requisite should be at hand so that any visitor may make use of them when wanted.

For instance, good talcum powder, sweet, wholesome soap, clean towels for each person, etc., should always be found there. There should be no expense saved in this respect, for there is much patronage that rests on just such little attentions as these.

A PICTURE is finished and the patrons are leaving the theatre. There is often a rush for the newly vacated seats, and the outgoing crowds are rushed by the incoming. Here is the place where a tactful usher is well-nigh indispensable. How easy it is, if they knew the secret of amiability, to dispose of that crowd and leave a pleasant impression on everyone.

Take for example an elderly couple coming in. They have visited but few theatres, and perhaps this one is a "blow out" for them. An usher meets them and asks "What preference have you in the way of seats?" Probably being unversed in theatre-going, they may ask to go to the front. The usher should escort them there even if the theatre is busy and leave them with the remark, "If you are too far front please let me know."

When these people leave the theatre, being already in a good humor, a request to know how they enjoyed the show is an attention that pleases, and thus they leave in a better humor and probably become regular patrons.

These are of course little points of the trade which only experience can teach. But to gain the most successful results, the whole thing resolves itself down to the following: Give the best service you can get for what you are willing and able to pay in the way of films. Employ the best of operators, ushers, door men, ticket sellers and other employees. Avoid the semblance of anything at all cheap or flaring. Do not have large outside posters unless you are sure that that is what attracts your class of patrons. Keep them posted on your program, and give them such other information as they may wish. Have everything neat and clean, with floors clear of paper and other refuse. If by following this advice you still fail, there is absolutely no hope for your house at all.

Balboa Studio Busy

ARRANGEMENTS for the production of "Balboa," which will be presented in San Francisco during the Panama-Pacific Exposition in 1915.

BELLE BENNETT
Balboa Leading Woman

are now nearly completed by the Balboa Amusement Producing Company, of which H. M. Horkheimer is president and general manager. Within a short time the cast will be announced, a number of well-known actors and actresses now on the legitimate stage having already been engaged for the production.

A recent addition to the Balboa forces was Belle Bennett, whose name is already favorably known in the motion picture world. Miss Bennett, who will be featured in future in all the Balboa Company's productions, is considered one of the best horsewomen appearing in motion pictures.

Henry King, who has been playing leads for the Balboa Company, is the principal in a three-reel feature, "The Path of Sorrow," which is now being produced under the direction of Bert Bracken, former director of the Robin Company. Madeleine Pardee, Gypsy Abbott and Victoria and Eugenie Forde are also cast in important parts in this production.

Owing to the fact that the Balboa studio at Long Beach, Cal., has grown too small to accommodate the number of people now associated with the company, within the next few weeks several new buildings will be erected. Two new companies will then produce a number of features, which have been completed by the scenario department.

H. M. Horkheimer, the president of the company, recently returned to California from the East, and E. D. Horkheimer, the secretary, will now take an extended business and pleasure trip on the Atlantic coast. He is not expected to return to the Balboa offices before the first of the year.

Among the recent additions to the Balboa forces are Mayme and Marguerite Bowles, two Louisville, Ky., girls, who are making their debut on the screen. Harriet Jensen, who was a member of the company a few months ago, has again joined her former associates at Long Beach, Cal. All three will be seen in future productions of the Balboa Company.

Billy Beckway is in charge of the developing room at the Long Beach studios, while Henry Stanley, the dean of the Balboa forces, is regarded as an authority on make-up among his associates, in addition to his able work as a character man.

A special event at the studios recently was the private projection of a number of films, just completed by the Balboa Company, which will be released within a few weeks. The excellent photography and superior work of the cast excited much favorable comment.

POWER PROJECTION MACHINES AT EXPOSITION

The Nicholas Power Company, manufacturers of Powers Cameragraph No. 6A projection machines, will have a booth at the International Exposition of Safety and Sanitation to be held at the Grand Central Palace from December 11 to 20. They will demonstrate the safety appliances of their projection machines in a specially constructed theatre

BARRY O'MOORE IN EDISON SERIES

A new Edison comic series, "The Adventures of Octavius," in which Barry O'Moore will be the star, is shortly to be begun. There are to be twelve stories written by Frederick

BARRY O'MOORE

Kummer, and they will appear simultaneously in the Pictorial Review.

Octavius is an amateur detective who becomes deeply entangled in the meshes of baffling criminal plots. His pursuit of desperate criminals and near-criminals in his stupendous efforts to suppress crime are original and humorous to a degree.

The first of the series provides a distinct thrill in the appearance of that eleven-foot boa constrictor which plays an important part in the story.

Barry O'Moore is well known to the motion picture public, as he has played character parts of every description for the Edison Company, after a stage experience of several years. Two of his most recent performances which show his ability are Louis of France in "A Tudor Princess" and John Hayes in "The Actress."

BLINKHORN'S FEATURES GO WELL

Among the visitors to Albert Blinkhorn's office, World's Tower Building, New York City, last week was Mr. Lubin, of Montreal, Canada. He has contracted to take all of the features that Blinkhorn will release. Contracts were also closed for Northern Illinois and Wisconsin, and all of the Southern States.

"David Copperfield" and "Kissing Cup" are making big hits and almost all the territory for these popular features has been sold.

OH, IT'S AN INTERESTING LIFE!

Punctuated by GEORGE D. PROCTOR

AT last an olive branch is tendered in the disagreeable situation now prevailing in the motion picture exhibitors organizations. Samuel H. Trigger, the standard bearer of the anti-Neff faction and the leader of the "bolt" last July at the National Convention in the Grand Central Palace, New York City, now makes peace overtures. Mr. Trigger writes in a letter, the meat of which runs as follows:

"Two calls have been issued for meetings of the Executive Committees of the Motion Picture Exhibitors League of America and the International Association, the former at Cincinnati and the latter in Chicago. I think it would be advisable if The Motion Picture News would use its good offices and influence in an endeavor to bring the two executive bodies together and amalgamate all the states into one large association.

"The facts are that a split occurred in the ranks of the exhibitors. There has been much said and much to state upon both sides, but we know that there must be a dissipation of strength when two national organizations exist. Then why continue traveling at different angles when by traveling on one avenue so much more may be accomplished? The past is past and we ought not to keep alive any ancient differences. I am not anxious to put any man in the position where people may say he is holding out against a union of all exhibitors.

"It seems inconceivable that the good work accomplished in the past should be negatived by the failure to get these two committees together at this opportune time. Therefore I make this appeal to The Motion Picture News in an endeavor to get the views of the officials of both sides and to get The Motion Picture News to use its good offices and influence to bring about harmony. These are simply my views which I hope you will publish."

These quarrels of the past have done much to hurt both sides. Because of them, because of the split, the leagues and the men in them have been called harsh names. They have been ridiculed. The unsettled conditions, the mud-slinging, the cuttle-fish ink-squirting tactics have acted as a deterrent to exhibitors thinking of joining the leagues and have sickened those already in who were not actually concerned in the melee.

Now there comes a chance to end all this. It should be seized. At this time it makes no difference to the man who has the future of exhibitors' leagues at heart which side was right last July and which side is the stronger now. The breach has hurt both sides. Now there comes a chance to heal it. For the love of Mike and in the name of suffering humanity take the chance, boys, and get together under one banner again.

The first woman to see herself under this banner is Agnes Egan Cobb, Mrs. C. Lang Cobb, Jr., at home, and the manager of Union Features and

SHE IS A PIONEER

Features Ideal, which concerns distribute five features a month between them. Once upon a time I called Mrs. Cobb "the pioneer film woman" for that's what she is. She has been in the business about as many years as her apparent age. Back in the days when the motion picture WAS in its infancy she did a little trooping. Then she was with B. F. Clements in Chicago. She has toured the country from coast to coast selling films. Now she has a nice swivel chair at 227 West Forty-second street where one has to be announced before he can enter the sanctum sanctorum.

The suit of P. A. Powers vs. the Universal Film Manufacturing Company and Carl Laemmle, its president, involving 1,540 shares of common stock and 1,250 of preferred, formerly owned by David Horsley, has been assigned by Judge Lehman, presiding over the Special Term of the Supreme Court to Judge Greenbaum for trial. Arthur Butler Graham, counsel for Powers, appeared Wednesday before Judge Graham, and had the case set for trial Monday in Special Term Part IV.

Monday was a busy night at the Screen Club. All the committees got busy and worked on various items of club business until midnight. A batch of new members were passed. But what interests most persons is the plans for the Screen Club's second annual ball.

This event will be held Saturday, January 31, 1914, in the Grand Central Palace. The big floor will be cleared for dancing, of course, and the boxes will be built around the sides of the main floor. William Robert Daly promises new and novel effects in the grand march and every mother's son is going to work hard to make this year's affair beat last year's. This is some contract, for the 1913 ball was a whopper.

Lots of fun is planned for the club. A "Reel" will be held last Saturday night of every month. It is hoped to hold the first one December 27. They will be under the general direction of Joe Farnham as chairman of the house committee. It is his plan to feature some notable every night as "scenario editor."

The pool tables will be utilized. A "crazy pool" tournament will be held every Saturday night according to plans, and a regulation pool tournament will be started as soon as feasible.

On the night of December 23, a Christmas tree will be held in the club.

Among the new ones at the club are J. Stuart Blackton, William T. (Pop) Rock and J. A. Berst, all of 'em life members.

Sol Lesser, he of the Golden Gate Film Exchange in San Francisco, and several other exchanges along the Pacific Coast, one of the biggest feature buyers in the country, is opening a New York office in Room 614 of the Candler building, 220 West Forty-second street. Sol may be found there for a month or so yet. His New York concern is the Golgate Feature Service.

Several hundred exhibitors remember the walk-out of last July. The two factions parted in anger. An angry man will make promises he won't attempt to fulfill when he cools down. Two weeks after the row I talked with Neff and I talked with Trigger. My estimate was then and is now that both sides wanted to get together, but didn't know how to go about it and were prevented by a false idea of pride. Now Trigger has swallowed his pride and anger, and made a plea for peace. Let's hope Mr. Neff meets him half way.

Good for Trigger. Without going into the merits of the old controversy, it seems to me that his peace overtures should be accepted. Everybody knows the old adage "in union there is strength." It must be apparent to all that one big organization is more to be desired than two which are fighting each other.

The American Moving Picture Machine Company of 101 Beekman street, is in the hands of a receiver following the institution of involuntary proceedings in bankruptcy. A. A. Gordon Murray is the receiver. The liabilities are estimated at between $100,000 and $125,000 and the assets at $70,000.

The offices of the General Film Company at 200 Fifth avenue are crowded these days. The managers of all the General Film branches in this country and Canada are in town for the big conference which happens once or twice a year anyway. While here several of them have been on the stand in the government suit against the Patents company.

It is Pathe, not Edison, which will from now on release a plural reel feature every Friday on the General Film program.

George Kleine is evidently getting busy in earnest while abroad. He cables in from Rome that he has completed negotiations for a series of seven, eight and nine reel subjects which are due here soon. These include well-known dramas and historical subjects.

Meanwhile work on the theatre which he is building in Forty-second street, New York, to house these photoplays is progressing rapidly. All of the steel work is up and it is expected that the building will be finished about February 15. The theatre will seat about 1,200.

Edna Flugrath, Edison leading woman, has been engaged on a long contract, so the British press says, by the London Film Company. This is the concern for which Harold M. Shaw, late of Edison and Imp, is head producer. While Mr. Shaw was with Edison Miss Flugrath appeared under his direction in "The Third Thanksgiving," "The Dam Builders" and "On Donovan's Division."

The London Film Company is some concern, lads. Don't overlook it as soon as it ties up with someone to handle its stuff here. Shaw has done Conan Doyle's "House of Temperly" so well that the English and Doyle himself were mightily pleased. He has done "Beauty and the Barge" with Cyril Maude and either has done or will do "Svengali" with Sir Herbert Beerbohm Tree.

M. Kashin, general manager of the Montague Feature Film Company of Montreal, which has temporary headquarters at 10 Victoria street, was in town during the week on a feature-buying expedition.

F. R. "Doc" Murphy, manager of the Mutual exchange in Springfield, Mass., has been transferred to Waterville, Me.

The "Around-the-World" pictures which opened at Carnegie Lyceum, New York, last Monday, are the product of the Gaumont Company.

L. J. Rose, secretary of the Ammex Film Company, has returned to California after a two weeks' stay in New York, where he was in conference with F. D. Halliday, general sales manager of Ammex, and Joseph R. Miles, general manager of the Exclusive Supply Corporation. In addition to being a horseman of considerable repute, Mr. Rose is a real pioneer. His family went via the wagon trail from Illinois to California when he was a mere boy. Seven men and some women and children never reached California on the memorable trip.

Frank V. Beal was seen on Broadway this week. So was Ed Carewe. Which means that the Tampa Films, Inc., of Tampa, Fla., has suspended producing activities pending re-organization. Frank Beal, formerly with Selig, was the director, and Carewe, late of Lubin, leading man. Jack Byrne, scenario expert, is still cavorting among the orange blossoms.

Oh, Why Not!

Christy Cabanne's first Mutual release will be "Until Death Do Us Part" with Mae Marsh, the Indian actor, Eagle Eye, the Burns brothers, Robert Harron and others.

Paul Kimberly, the charming young Englishman, now at the helm of the Thanhouser Film, Ltd., head European office at 100 Charing Cross Road, London, is getting out a house organ "Thanhouser Topics." Kimberly will be remembered from his recent visit here which terminated only a few weeks ago.

Edgar Lewis, Reliance director, is staging an Italian drama written by Russell E. Smith, of Frank Wood's scenario staff.

The Pathe American Company will produce four and five part features soon.

The Eclair Company is sending a band of players to New Orleans to produce "The Kangaroo," a six part feature. "The Kangaroo" is the name of a resort featured in the action which is laid in ante-bellum days.

Travers Vale, Reliance director, goes to Biograph.

The American Film Manufacturing Company will have no release on Christmas day. Instead "The Shriner's Daughter," a two-reel subject, will be released December 22.

Murray F. Beier, of the Emby Feature Film Company, at 145 West Forty-fifth Street, thinks pretty well of his coming releases, "The Nihilist" and "The Apache's Daughter." He is now booking Sarah Bernhardt in "The Romance of an Actress" and M. Mounet-Sully in "Œdipus Rex." Emby Features will handle two feature subjects a week.

H. N. Morey, of the Peoples Vaudeville Company, in the American Theatre Building, is booking the four-part feature "Queen Elizabeth."

Lillian Christie, formerly with the Vitagraph and Kalem companies, has joined the Western Essanay ranks at Niles, Cal.

The Film Redeveloping Company, of 145 West Forty-fifth Street, with Mr. Gutterman at the head, is about to enter the producing field.

B. R. Thomas, of the Gotham Film Company, of 145 West Forty-fifth Street, is opening an office to take care of the commercial end of the business.

Jack Edward Moore is now handling the publicity for Albert Blinkhorn and his Turner and Hepworth films.

Ray U. Smalwood is now directing pictures at the Imp studio with Ethel Grandin as his leading woman.

William Russell goes from Thanhouser to Biograph.

Harry Eytinge, Edison comedian, gave his annual party for the girls at the studio recently. Those present were Mildred Bruce, Bessie Bannon, Rose Engoran, Cathryn Bogstedt, Minnie Reuben, Susette Mosher, Margaret O'Keefe, Gertrude Brown and Lulu Holm.

Bernhardt Niemeyer is playing in a series of Kinemacolor comedies being filmed at Whitestone.

The Poli circuit has installed Kinemacolor in the following houses: Worcester and Springfield, Mass.; New Haven and Hartford, Conn., and Scranton, Pa.

The American Company, Ltd., British agents for the American Film Manufacturing Company, is now occupying new and more commodious premises at 183 Wardour Street, London, W.

C. J. Giegerich, having graduated from the Leslie syndicate, is now handling the advertising for the Screen Club ball program.

The All Star players who have been down in Georgia producing Augustus Thomas' "In Missouri" retaurned Wednesday, including, of course, Burr McIntosh and Larry McGill.

The Vitagraph Company produced, in connection with the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company, a picture, "The Price of Thoughtlessness," aiding the crusade.

More than one hundred Jews, men and women, from the Brownsville section of Brooklyn, gathered at the Vitagraph studio and played in a big "yiddisher ball" scene in a feature drama Van Dyke Brooke is producing.

Music and the Picture

Suggestions Invited, Questions Cheerfully Answered

Address: Music Department, The Motion Picture News

DURING a visit recently to the Savoy Theatre in New York I was pleasantly surprised to see thrown on the screen a small neat sign which read:

"During the following picture S. M. Berg's Symphony Orchestra will render Gounod's 'Meditation.'"

Although this may look like a very small thing, it is really a very important feature. People like to be told what the music is, if they are informed in a pleasant way. Have you never heard at a musicale, the remark "What is that he is playing"?

Started by Professor Berg

This innovation, if it may be so termed, was started by Professor Berg himself. For many years a successful leader and musician, he has had the opportunity of finding out what the people want in the way of good music at the proper time, and when good music is given they also want to know just what the selection is. There are a great many dramas that are very successful if accompanied by good music, and there are comedies that "get over" if they are aided by ragtime. If a medley of the latter is to be played there is no need to advertise the fact, for every one knows the popular music, but for operatic music an announcement is a good plan.

It does not make any difference whether your theatre has a piano or a twenty-piece orchestra, you can have suitable music and at the same time, good music. Poor music will work every bit as much havoc with your business as will poor pictures. If your drummer does not follow the pictures, and insists on just banging away at his instrument, get one that can and will follow the screen. In the fight scenes he can be of more material aid to your picture than anything else, if he understands his business. The same applies to the pianist or to the operator of the mechanical instruments. But make it your watchword to follow the picture with good music, and take care that your patrons are "put next" to that fact.

I noticed recently an article by a man who had made a great success in the grocery business by "creating appetites" for Sunday night suppers Now you can all do the same thing, no matter what there is at your command. Give your patrons an appetite for good music, that follows the picture, and see if they do not return for more. But be sure that you let them know what they are getting. Tell them that you want suggestions and criticisms and you will get them, but show them that it is good music that you are working for.

"Good Music" Your Middle Name

The Regent Theatre in New York is a specialist in good music that follows the story on the film. Perhaps you have not the means at hand for producing what they can do in completeness, nor have you perhaps even got an orchestra, but if you only have a piano you can tell your patrons that from now on your middle name will be "good music" and don't stop until you get it!

Musicians will find that the music suggestions offered by many of the manufacturers will be of great assistance in working up an available program that will at the same time please and amuse. But none of this can be done unless you rehearse beforehand. It is not simply a question of looking at the pictures and then deciding what you will play, but get there before the audience and practice.

The more pretentious theatres have recognized that good music is one of the most potent drawing cards. The bigger theatres are making a feature of good music all over the country. The little fellows will follow.

WHAT THE MOTION PICTURE THEATRE REPLACES

THE motion picture show is something more than popular. It is intimate. To an extraordinary extent it is entering into the daily thought of the masses. The good men and women who are fond of writing on literature and life, who are devoting themselves to the task of bringing the drama into touch with the life of the people, must be amazed, and slightly chagrined, at the intensity with which the film-play has seized upon the popular imagination. The crowds not only throng to the shows, they talk about them; on street corners, in the cars, and over the hoods of baby carriages.

From time to time there have been plays in the regular theatre which have become the theme of general discussion. There have been players whom the public has made its favorites. But the theatre as an institution has hardly impressed itself upon the popular mind. A show was either good or bad, and there it ended with the average theatre-goer. The technique of the theatre was a subject for professionals and "highbrows."

But the crowd discusses the technique of the motion picture theatre with as much interest as literary salons in Paris or London discuss the minutiæ of the higher drama. The crowd knows how the films are made, and what it costs to make them, and who the leading actors in the show are. The producers of these shows have achieved an extraordinary triumph. They have converted their entire audience into first-nighters.

THE interest of the masses in the motion picture show is even more personal than that. They are not only spectators and critics, but to a very considerable extent they are the authors. Everybody is writing motion picture scenarios. In part it may have been a real dearth of ideas which induced the film producers to appeal for contributions to the nation at large. In part it may be excellent business to inoculate the audiences, not excluding children of the grammar grades, with the virus of authorship.

The regular theatre draws a not inconsiderable part of its revenue from "students" of the drama who go to the theatre in order to learn how to write plays. The number of those thus directly interested in the motion picture plays must be enormous. In a very real sense the photo-play then becomes a truly popular art. The operatic composer will strive to give reality —and popularity—to his music by incorporating folk-themes into his score.

To the extent that the music of the masses enters into the finished product the composer's art is a popular art. The motion picture showman goes much further than the composer can by throwing upon the screen the very ideas supplied him by the crowd in the seats.

THE average motion picture show is better art than the old-fashioned melodrama which the pictures have so largely replaced. The vice of melodrama is less in the action than in the dialogue. It must be a very hardened theatre-goer who can resist the elementary appeal of physical contact, of animated pistol play, of hazardous leaps across chasms and from the windows of burning buildings, of splendid heroisms and arrant villainies.

It is the spoken heroics of melodrama that make for laughter. The silent film-play solves the problem at a stroke. It eliminates all artificialities of speech, and substitutes a great number of popular realities. The setting of the photo-play is incomparably more real than anything even a Belasco can give us.

It reproduces action in real deserts, on real oceans, in real forests. The heroine walks out of a very actual cottage, down actual steps, and takes a perfectly authentic car to the stores. The audience know that these things and the trees, rocks, bridges, boats, and guns are absolutely true to life, because it has often seen the man with the camera at work.—The Cinema.

CHARLES KLEIN'S GREAT DRAMA "THE THIRD DEGREE" (LUBIN 5 REELS)
The first release of the General Film Company's new Special Feature Photoplay Masterpieces.

"THE CASE OF CHERRY PURCELLE"

Eclair Universal.

A modern detective story, after the story by Arthur Stringer in Hampton's Magazine. Its applicability to modern life is undoubtedly its most telling point. Mr. Stringer evidently founded the story more or less on fact, for throughout the production its realism stands pre-eminent. The original name "The Most Wonderful Woman in the World' was altered to the above, the latter being more suitable.

The only fault to be found with the whole story is its brevity. Had the story been given two additional reels with action to match, the audience would never weary of it. It is one of those gripping, vital stories, that will hold an audience motionless during its projection.

"THE CASE OF CHERRY PURCELLE"—UNIVERSAL

Cherry Purcelle, a girl, alone in the world, possesses the spirit of adventure strong within her. So when a chance is offered her to join a gang of wire-tappers and confidence-men, she eagerly accepts. Her duty is to entrap millionaires with her beauty, so that they become victims of her accomplices. Throughout there is the tightening of the net by a detective, who is unable to get evidence that is sufficient to send the gang "up the river."

Kerrfoot, a millionaire, who has been very good to Cherry, is selected as a victim and she, not knowing his identity, sets out to get him. She has slowly but surely tired of the old life and though Kerrfoot no longer has any faith in her, she goes to him and tells the whole story. They are married and "Camera Eye" Sherman is enabled to round up the whole gang with the exception of herself.

Belle Adair as Cherry Purcelle registered some very competent and clever work. It is her first leading part and she made the most of it. Alec B. Francis as "Coke" Morgan had probably the hardest role to handle. His impersonation of a cocaine fiend was realistic. Helen Martin and Fred Truesdel completed the important members of the cast.

H. A. LANDE LANDED A BIG ONE

The feature photoplay, "The Great Lure of Paris," is booked at Hammerstein's Victoria for an indefinite period through the Film Exchange. Hammerstein is advertising the production as the "biggest" White Slave picture of direct importation from Paris.

WHAT IS THE KINEPLASTIKON?

Pepper's Ghost on the Motion Picture Screen

LAST summer some excitement was caused in New York by the announcement that the Shuberts had secured control of an entirely new and wonderful method of motion picture projection which was certain to revolutionize the picture business. The Shuberts, we were told, had closed with the German inventor for a large sum of money. The idea, previously, had been offered to Marc Klaw, but that gentleman sent a representative, with a knowledge of optics and photography to investigate it, and declined the offer.

But the Kineplastikon is still being shown and exploited in Europe. The pictures are novel and striking. They resemble Pepper's ghost. But what is Pepper's Ghost? the reader will ask. This: As you sit in a darkened auditorium you see on the stage, figures apparently moving in space. Mark the word "apparently." What you see are reflected images of people —not real people. You see ghosts, in fact; not supernatural ghosts but physico-optical ghosts.

Now, suppose that instead of looking at an ordinary motion picture on an ordinary screen, you saw the figures apparently moving about in space. That is the principle of the Kineplastikon.

These pictures appear in the atmosphere only and they may be made to look either solid or ghostly at will. In order to make films of the kind required for Kineplastikon, the figures must be photographed white or lightly tinted upon an opaque black background. The films are projected from the side of the screen, instead of either from before or behind it, while the effect of surface reflections from the glass, which latter would destroy the illusion, is prevented by the interposition between it and the audience of a fine transparent gauze sheet.

In our judgment there is nothing patentable in the broad general idea of Kineplastikon. Professor Pepper, at the Polytechnic in London forty or fifty years ago, made the first experiments in this form of projection.

The motive in printing this article is to bring the idea of this attractive illusion to the notice of film makers desirous of making releases of a "somewhat different" nature. The exhibitor, who aims to give his patrons all possible change and variety would, no doubt, welcome a few pictures of this kind.

WORLD TOUR TEAMS IN PICTURES

Baseball fans will have an opportunity to follow the Giants and White Sox around the world by the means of moving pictures, as it has just been announced that a Pathe cameraman is to accompany the teams in their over-seas journeys. Pathe Freres have been awarded the exclusive privilege for this photographic pilgrimage, and it is safe to say that the pictures will be of much interest.

Frank Chance, baseball's "peerless" leader, will also be seen shortly in a baseball comedy produced by the same company. Miss Gwendoline Pates is the leading lady.

FILM CRUSADE AGAINST SOCIAL EVIL

Motion Picture Produced With Co-operation of Samuel H. London, Late of Federal Secret Service, is Result of Seven Years' Work as Investigator and Attacks the "Out-of-My-House Policy

ENTERING a new field, the motion picture is now being used as a weapon to fight the "white slave" traffic by preventative rather than curative means.

Among the first of the pictures of this kind, and probably the most authoritative, as it shows actual scenes in the underworld of New York, New Orleans and Denver, is "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic," a film running a little more than 4 000 feet, which has been on exhibition for a week at the Park Theatre, New York City, to crowded houses, and also in Troy, New York.

THE PRE-ARRANGED "RESCUE"
Scene from "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic."

The scenario from which this film was produced was written by Samuel H. London, who knows whereof he writes. Mr. London headed the investigation work done at the instigation of John D. Rockefeller when the Rockefeller Commission was probing the "white slave" traffic. Before that he was head of the branch of the Government Secret Service which has to do with "white slavery."

For seven years he had made a study of the subject all over this country and in several foreign countries. The picture was produced by the Moral Feature Film Company with offices in Room 801, Longacre Building, New York City, and will be handled by the Sociological Research Film Company, which has offices in the New York Theatre Building, New York.

"I was eager to get the picture in towns like Troy," explained Mr. London, "because I wanted to get the picture before factory girls. I have found this class of girls the most frequent sufferers from the evil which we are fighting. I have gone over the production pretty carefully and aided Mr. Beal all I could when he was producing the picture, and I feel it is as near a photographic representation as possible of the great evil."

The picture was produced in New York, New Orleans and Denver, under the direction of Frank V. Beal, a producer formerly with the Selig Polyscope Company and later with the Tampa Films Inc. Ed. Carewe, late of Lubin, plays the male lead. Virginia Mann plays the girl who suffers through him, while Jean Thomas is his sweetheart. Ninita Bristow plays an emigrant girl. Elinor O. Peterson has one of the leading parts.

The whole picture hits at the "out-of-my-house" policy as adopted by parents. Ed, a recruiting officer for the Scarlet Militia, tries to scrape an acquaintance with Virginia. He succeeds only by a ruse. He gets an accomplice to insult her on the street. Then he makes a grandstand rescue and is a hero in her eyes. The rest follows quickly. He drugs her in a cafe and takes her to his apartments. Fearing prosecution, he flees with her to New Orleans, where she leaves him and goes to Denver. Ninita, an immigrant girl, is also swallowed up in the maw of the trade and its vicious workings are laid bare faithfully.

The moral, as driven in, is that if Virginia's father had not ordered her out of the house after her first step in the wrong direction, she never would have become a member of the great army of Magdalens.

"OUT OF MY HOUSE!"

"WHEN A WOMAN WILLS"

Kleine-Cines

ANOTHER fine picture will leave the Kleine offices on December 30th under the title of "When a WomanWills." This two-part production has been cut down from three thousand feet to its present size. The best and most interesting parts have been retained, filling the picture full of splendid action, beautiful scenes and good situations. The story is tense to the final scene and the action travels from one continent to the other. A good situation is brought out in the introduction of the Canoa Club, an international secret institution, which is used by the unscrupulous plotters as an agent to carry out their scheme to secure the fortune of the widow.

Jane Pierce, a charming widow, is bequeathed a fortune at the death of her husband. By the terms of this will, the fortune reverts to her cousin, Daniel Sage, unless she marries a man possessing at least $2,000,000.

Sage, knowing the terms of the will, decides to enlist the services of the Canoa Club, of which he is a member, in securing one of its members who has not the required amount of money to seek the hand of his cousin in marriage. If his plan is successful he promises to give the club half of his inheritance He outlines his plan to Harry Osborn, a young and good-looking member, but who does not possess much money. Sage advances him money for any expenses he may have and accompanies him to Europe, where Jane has gone.

In Paris Jane meets an amiable and careless Italian, who loses everything at a wheel of fortune. He is inclined to buy a couple of lottery tickets with the few remaining dollars he has. Things look very favorable to Sage and Osborn up to the time Jane meets Petro. They are thrown into each other's society at the gambling tables at Monte Carlo. This gambling scene is a massive arrangement and employs hundreds of people. They meet each other again and another big background is furnished in the reception given at one of the leading hotels. The furnishings used are exquisite.

At the start this love of Jane's is one-sided, her too frequent attentions to Petro making him become indifferent. In the meanwhile she refuses numerous invitations from the schemers. While out riding Jane meets Petro. An exchange of notes takes place. As Petro has no paper on which to write, he uses the lottery tickets. This action is seen by the two conspirators and they determine to secure these notes from Jane.

Petro and Jane meet each other again in Rome. Sage again enlists the services of his club, and two other members are employed, as he has lost confidence in Osborn. Osborn, however, finds an opportunity, while Jane is watching a game of soccer football, to steal her pocketbook with the notes in it. This action is witnessed by her servant, who immediately advises her. Petro, who is passing in his automobile, is pressed into service. A wild ride ensues. The auto in which Osborn is riding turns turtle and the occupants are severely injured. Petro also sustains a bruised arm. The next day an item in the newspapers tells of the accident, and also on the same page the winner of the grand prize in the lottery is announced. Jane, on seeing the winning number, curiously inspects Petro's ticket.

Sage, discouraged, calls on Jane and offers her one-third of the legacy providing she marries the man of his choice. Petro comes in as Jane says to her cousin, "This gentleman is a multi-millionaire, and in marrying him I retain the terms of the will and forfeit nothing." C. J. V.

FOR THOSE WHO WORRY O'ER PLOTS AND PLAYS

WILLIAM LORD WRIGHT

BENJAMIN P. Schulberg is scenario editor for the Famous Players Film Company. In past years he has also served efficiently as editor for the Imp, Powers, and other concerns. He is, perhaps, the youngest editor in Filmland in point of years, but he is old in literary experience. He has written many of the popular photoplays, and many of the large productions of the Famous Players Company were from adaptations made by Mr. Schulberg. He writes:

"In making adaptations of famous plays for the motion picture, I find that not more than one-third of the total number of situations, incidents and events in the original subject can be directly utilized. One-third must be reconstructed and substantially altered, and the last third must be created. For this reason, the greatest difficulty in making adaptations of literary or dramatic works is in retaining the atmosphere of the original, at times as important and always more subtle and elusive than the story itself.

"Sometimes, due to the varying natures and influences of such subjects, this rule reverses itself, and it becomes necessary to eliminate rather than to augment situations. In the case of 'Tess of the D'Urbervilles,' Thomas Hardy's masterpiece, the story was so comprehensive and detailed that a faithful and consistent adaptation would result in a prohibitive length of film. Only the main thread of the story, powerful in itself, could be considered. Yet with a writer like Thomas Hardy, who is essentially a builder of situations, elimination of incidents and episodes, is no easy task. His plot is strongly woven together, and all incidents and events that contribute toward it make a firmly molded unit of thought and action.

"A subject of this kind portraying a woman's sin and her resultant sorrows, must moreover be treated delicately, which exacts all the more care and tact in preparing the film version, because of its power for greater visual scope and plot suggestion.

"To return to the premise upon which we started, we were forced to eliminate a considerable portion of the story. If we could judge each incident individually, upon its own dramatic merits, the task would not be so dangerous. But another element enters: Hardy has a peculiar manner of making a casual episode exert a lasting influence upon the rest of the story, so that we were not alone compelled to condense, but to unite the incidents incorporated into the scenario with as much of Hardy's technique as possible. The writer has no impulse to exaggerate when he terms 'Tess of the D'Urbervilles' one of the hardest dramatic subjects ever converted to the screen.

Required Delicate Handling

"'In the Bishop's Carriage,' Miriam Michelson's story, opens with Nance, already engaged in a partnership of crime with Tom Dorgan, the pickpocket. In the motion picture version, it became necessary to suggest her introduction into this life, her meeting with Tom Dorgan, her loyalty to him, etc. And yet we were compelled to restrain the love between these two so as not to complicate affairs when, later, Nancy meets Fred Obermuller, the theatrical manager, whose kindness reforms her and admiration for whom ripens into unrequited love.

"In the beginning of the story we created scenes suggesting Nance as the inmate in the charity home, where she is persecuted by the cruel matron. Falsely accused of theft, and inhumanly punished, she decides to escape. Pursued by the police, she takes refuge in the room of Tom Dorgan, where later he finds her. Both are refugees from a common justice and their common lot inspires them to cast their fortunes together. Almost the whole of the first reel is of new material, and in no manner suggested by the original. 'The Play Is the Thing,' but do not be afraid to take liberties if it will help the photoplay in strength, coherency or unity."

Mr. Schulberg recently expressed some interesting views, and we herewith reprint some portions we think of interest to writers:

"The photoplay writers will soon come into their own. Their labors will soon be accorded full recognition, credit and compensation. To them the writer wishes to say that the idea, the plot-germ, is more important than all the technique that can be invented or developed. Film manufacturers are demanding ideas and not technique. Ideas, and not the manner in which they are presented and suggested, are necessary for the further advancement of the photoplay.

"Correspondence schools cannot teach a pupil how to create ideas. Experts cannot develop creative power, and it is for this reason that correspondence schools attempt to promote the importance of the technique, implying, without daring to openly declare it, that it is a more essential factor than the idea itself. The trouble with most photoplaywrights is that they follow the line of least resistance. If you do not think you possess originative or interpretative talent, please spare yourself heartache and labor and retire gracefully.

"The remuneration for photoplay scripts is steadily increasing. It will continue to improve. But the scenario writer must not expect as much for a script as the magazines pay for short stories. After all has been said, the short story is a more difficult and intricate art and requires greater training and ability. Accept this fact from one who has tackled both fields with reasonable success in each."

The idea is the thing. A script containing a good idea and little technique will sell. A script containing faultless technique and no idea will not sell. Both are devoutly to be wished. Too much technique frequently loses the plot. Too little technique often cheapens the price. We have always taken the stand that if the writer possesses clarity of thought and originality, his technique will care for itself. Technique of whatever description should be but a means of putting over the story clearly and logically. Miss Maibelle Heikes Justice, one of the most successful of photoplay writers, who builds single and multiple reel stories with equal facility, never read a work on technique in her life. Her scripts carry her own technique and they are models for clearness.

"Refined Comedy"

Perhaps you have been reading numerous statements to the effect that the market for refined comedy is no more, and that only stuff of the "slap-stick" variety is wanted by the producers. Don't ever believe such assertions. So long as the motion picture screen continues popular, just so long will refined, convincing comedy be essential. Without such productions the motion picture theatre exhibitor will lose to the cheap vaudeville house next door. Cheap vaudeville is long on "slap-stick" buffoonery and short on refined comedy. Such companies as Edison, Essanay, Vitagraph, Thanhouser, and others have contributed some genuine humor to the screen, and in so doing have contributed to the pleasure of the audiences.

There is a certain market for photoplay burlesque, of course. But there will always be a market for well-written action with the humorous plot. Imagine Edison, for instance, turning down a refined comedy of merit for a "Katzenjammer" effusion. George Bernard Shaw says: "When a comedy of mine is performed, it is nothing to me that the spectators laugh—any fool can make an audience laugh. I want to see how many of them, laughing or grave, have tears in their eyes."

There is hardly a script editor in the business to-day who will not snatch at the refined comedy story, providing it is really refined comedy. Such productions appeal to the better element, and when good, are never tiresome. Occasional burlesque of the "knock-down-and-drag-out" kind affords relaxation, but too much of it becomes wearisome.

"Belled Buzzard" Again

In the November number of The Writer's Magazine, "The Belled Buzzard" again comes to the spotlight. We furnished our conception of the "Belled Buzzard's" history, and along comes Irvin S. Cobb's short story, "The Belled Buzzard," for review. Both reached the editorial desk at the same time. The "Belled Buzzard" idea is a newspaper idea pure and simple. We think we started it five or six years ago. There is no copyright on the buzzard-that-was-belled idea, for the story has been circulated from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We have heard that the "Belled Buzzard" is about to be filmed. Briefly, a small boy tied a small sleigh-bell to the leg of a captive buzzard and released it. The bell tinkled as the bird flew about. It was reported in many states. Later other buzzards were "belled" and the idea lost its novelty. Mr. Cobb took the "Belled Buzzard" idea and built a strong plot about it—but that is still another story.

Credit to Authors

The Photoplay Magazine has also taken the stand that photoplay authors should receive full credit for deserving work. The magazine says: "Writers with a reputation in the field of fiction are many. And this statement will also apply to the stage. Why shouldn't the same rule apply to writers of motion pictures? The movement is unhesitatingly endorsed. Robert W. Chambers, Harold Bell Wright, and several other novelists are now dramatizing their fiction and will get immediate recognition. Were they to write an acceptable photoplay it would probably be submitted with the understanding that the author be given credit on the screen. Why should not the photoplay writer, who has a reputation and whose stories are being daily produced, be given the same credit? At least the older photoplaywrights are entitled to credit. Such writers helped to make the photoplay game what it is, by furnishing ideas and plots—it wasn't the magazine writers, although there is plenty of room for such. More power and encouragement to new and old photoplaywrights! Your reward is coming."

Along comes a correspondent who fears that the rule of credit may "work both ways." He argues thus: "I certainly wouldn't like to see in one of the trade papers anything like this: '. . . the author showed bad taste in forgetting the fact that the telephone had not been invented until some years after the time of the play.'" Deserving criticism hurts no one. Such criticism, if the author was named, would tend to foster more care and research on his part, thus aiding the entire industry. In a case like the one cited above, the director and editor would also share censure. And while arguing against full credit, this correspondent wants to know if it would be plagiarism to use articles clipped from trade papers either "wholly or in part" for a Sunday photoplay page. Give credit always where credit is due either to a publication or an individual.

Are Really Agents

In asking for the addresses of film companies that buy scripts, a correspondent writes: "I find that the agents advertising in the magazines are really only agents for 'correspondence schools,' their ideas not being to buy manuscripts but to sell information which is not worth the money asked." Late markets are the Vitagraph Western, which will consider, for a limited time, good two and three-reel photoplays adapted to California production, elaborate military pictures not wanted. Address Vitagraph Company of America, Santa Monica, Cal. Many writers also will be delighted to learn that Frank E. Woods is now editor for the Mutual Film Corporation, Twenty-third street and Sixth avenue, New York City. He wishes good scripts of all kinds and variety. Scripts that will be appropriate for Reliance, Majestic, Komic, Apollo, etc. Best prices and prompt service are assured when Woods is at the editorial helm. He considers only the best.

The Press Agent

We know of several would-be photoplaywrights who have failed in not becoming press agents. We are not running this department for the personal exploitation of authors, but in an endeavor to interest and instruct photoplaywrights. Another thing: Remember that the editor of a trade journal department is handicapped, and not helped, by his work.

If he serves his readers conscientiously, he is certain to unconsciously offend someone in power sooner or later. If the trade journal department editor is unfortunate enough to be a script writer, his work frequently stands less chance of acceptance than that of the most obscure "free lance."

Warren's Directorship

The admirers of Giles R. Warren, pioneer editor and author of hundreds of photoplays, will be pleased to learn that he is making an unqualified hit as a director of photoplays. His production for Warner's Features of "The Lady of the Lake" is creating a furore, and "The Monastery" now promises to excel its predecessor, if that is possible. Mr. Warren recently turned down a flattering offer to become managing director for a well-known English film concern.

The Hall of Fame

President A. Van Buren Powell, of "The Order of Optimists," has come to life. He is satisfied with a success of the modest but remunerative sort and still believes optimism pays.

R. D. Armstrong, who for two years past has been editor of the American Film Co., has joined the Ammex Co. at San Diego. Armstrong has written some vivid Western work.

Edwin Barbour, of the Lubin scenario staff, has sailed for Bermuda, where he will enjoy a deserved vacation. He expects to write some feature stories while in the land of sunshine.

Herman E. L. Beyer is revising some of his earlier scripts and says he is trying hard not to cut out the flavor. He finds revising photoplays is like warming up dishes. "Is there anything better than a potato baked in the jacket? Well, just let it get cold, then warm it up, and the flavor is lost. You must be a good cook to 'warm-up' successfully."

Daniel M. Clark, scenario editor Motograph Co., 606 Eleventh street, Washington, D. C., writes that he is in the market for the following: Good plays of all kinds with scenes laid mostly out of doors, and in season; comedies, but not silly stuff; and strong dramas, involving deep love and its opposite. For these he says he pays according to the worth of the manuscript.

BREAKS COAST RECORD

Just exactly 38,680 persons paid admission to the Clemmer Theatre, Seattle, during the week of Nov. 16-22 to see George Kleine's "The Last Days of Pompeii." Gross receipts for the week were $5,800.10, which absolutely establishes a record on the Pacific Coast for a six-day showing of any motion picture.

Advertising the Picture

TO attract and hold business are the fundamental objects in advertising the picture by means of advance notices, slides, posters, newspaper advertising, heralds and other devices. The two objects are supplementary. First the business must be attracted. Then it must be held.

It is with the idea of attracting the passerby that the advice is continually dinned into the ears of the exhibitor to make his lobby a thing of beauty and not deface it by dime-novel posters. New ideas, novelties, these are the things that attract. And when they are not of a nature which may repel some, they will usually help to hold the business.

An entirely new and novel stunt was recently tried with success at the Palms Number One theatre in Indianapolis, Ind., which is owned by the E. G. Soubrier Amusement Company and managed by Grant & Heath.

Auto Used in Advertising

On the day when "The Speed Kings," a Keystone comedy, was showing, an automobile similar to the one used by the winner of the last Elgin race was secured to stand in front of the theatre. The result, according to the manager, was highly satisfactory, so much so that he went right inside and wrote a letter to the New York Motion Picture Corporation, manufactureres of Keystone comedies, and told of his success.

The letter was bubbling over with praise for Keystone comedies, but the parts of it which pertain to advertising the picture are valuable. They follow herewith:

"Indianapolis, Ind.

"Gentlemen:

"Under separate cover I am sending you a photo of our Palms Theatre as it appeared on our semi-weekly Keystone Day, the subject being "The Speed Kings" which my patrons as well as myself pronounce the greatest comedy creation ever produced in motion pictures to date.

"We opened the beautiful Palms Theatre September 8, with a Mutual program. I established a Keystone Day from the start, which occurs every Tuesday and Friday. It has been an absolute necessity for us to add Saturday and Sunday, making four Keystone Days a week. Of course all of the back releases have been shown in the city many times before, however, they are always more than welcome by our patrons, and just as sure as the Keystone Day one sheet frame goes out in front, capacity business rules.

"In reference to the 'Speed Kings' I wish to say that the Stutz car that wins the race in the picture is a product of this city and through the courtesy of Stutz we were able to secure his Number Five racer, which is a duplicate of the Number Eight car, and the winner of the last Elgin, Ill., race. Mr. Stutz personally drove the car down to our theatre and allowed it to stand in front of the house throughout the entire performance of the 'Speed Kings,' the result was that the crowds were so in excess of our capacity that we have booked it for a return engagement.

"You may not believe this statement; however, it is the truth.

"Very truly yours,
GRANT & HEATH, Managers
"E. G Soubrier Amusement Co."

Establishing Definite Days

One thing stands out above all others in this communication—the good results obtained by having definite days set apart for definite pictures. Then the lover of those pictures knows just when and where he can see them.

Plan Found Effective

The plan runs parallel to establishing departments in a publication. When a man opens a newspaper he turns to the part which interests him. He turns to the sporting page, the theatrical page or the financial page, according to his fancy. He knows just where to find what he wants.

So with motion pictures. The patron goes where he thinks or hopes he will see what he wants. If he likes comedies and knows that Thursday is the comedy night at a theatre several blocks away, he will go to that theatre instead of to the one around the corner. This is not theory. It is fact according to Mr. Heath, who has put the idea into actual operation.

Motion Picture Display at Frisco Exposition

Exhibit in Palace of Liberal Arts Will Embody Latest Wrinkles in Photography and Projection

IN addition to the great number of photographs that will be used to exhibit processes and results in the various displays that will be seen at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition, the subject of motion photography will be exploited as it never has been before in the Palace of Liberal Arts when the nations assemble in San Francisco, California, in 1915 to celebrate the completion of the Panama Canal begun by the French but finished by the United States.

The art of photography has never been given in any exposition as important a place as it will occupy in 1915, because the last decade has marked tremendous strides in the perfection of this high craft, which is so rapidly encroaching on the domain of fine art that some doubts have been expressed whether it should not be given space in the Palace of Fine Arts.

The display of cameras, lenses, latest inventions in the realm of motion pictures and the mechanical nature of this material argue in favor of its placement in the department of Liberal Arts where process and product, camera and developed picture will attract the attention of the hundreds of thousands who will come to the exposition.

Responding to the United States Government's invitation to participate, the producers of photographic apparatus all over the world have been immediate and enthusiastic in application for space, so that the problem which Theodore Hardee, chief of the department of Liberal Arts of the exposition, is facing is to provide ample and proper accommodations for all the exhibitors. The number of applications for space presages, through the process of judicious elimination, an exhibit of "the cream" of the world's photographic product.

The plan of the chief of the department of Liberal Arts in locating such exhibits as that of motion photography, contemplates an interesting competitive arrangement. On one side of the beautiful Palace of Liberal Arts will be displayed the American-made articles, together with America's achievements in photographic printing. On the other side of the building will be the exhibits from England, which promise to be very extensive, France, Germany, Japan and all the other nations that are concerned in motion pictures.

In the schedule of exposition exhibits, motion photography is listed under Group 33.

All classes of cameras will find a place in suitable environment and all classes of pictures will be revealed in an advantageous manner.

A display of the latest inventions that seek the transmission of photographs over telegraphic wires will be of particular interest and importance, and in this line should be unique in the history of expositions.

Another feature of the photography display that will add importance to the exhibit will be the assembling of the most recent processes in motion picture making and projecting.

This agency will be of enormous attracting power in the Palace of Liberal Arts. So that this single department of photography, related as it is, in Group 23, to the department of Liberal Arts, will, singly and by itself, be an epitome of the progress of the world in the last decade as shown, not only in the development of the mechanics of photography, but mainly in its product—the pictures.

H. J. Ward Here from Australia

He is One of the Managing Directors Now in Charge of J. C. Williamson, Ltd., and He Wants Features

SINCE the death in Paris last summer of J. C. Williamson, the Australian theatrical magnate whose name it bears, the firm of J. C. Williamson, Ltd., has been in the hands of three managing directors, Hugh J. Ward, George Tallis and Clyde Meynell, who have succeeded to the business. Mr. Ward has just arrived in this country in quest of American plays for his many theatres in Australia and South Africa.

Mr. Ward is making his headquarters with the New York representative of J. C. Williamson, Ltd., Walter C. Jordan, of Sanger & Jordan, in the Empire Theatre Building, and is stopping at the Hotel Astor. He is a native of Philadelphia and visited his relatives there on Sunday, running over to Washington Monday and Tuesday to see George M. Cohan and his parents, and returning to Philadelphia on Wednesday. He is now back in New York, where he will probably now remain for some time.

HE HAS GAINED FAME BY HIS ENERGY

In Mr. G. Callaghan, the Radium Gold Fibre Screen Company has a young New York representative of singular energy and agreeable personality. Although only two or three years in the motion picture business, he has achieved great success in popularizing the Radium screen amongst exhibitors. He is intelligent and progressive in his ideas. The Radium Company is about to enter the motion pictures supply business and Mr. Callaghan should be a valuable aid in spreading success for the new venture.

Edison Players Return

AFTER touring Europe for the Edison Company for the past seven months, Miriam Nesbitt, Marc McDermott, Charles Brabin and Otto Brautigan, camera-man, returned to the United States on the Carpathia and will now remain in this country for some time. During the period they were abroad, the Edison players visited England, Ireland, Wales, Belgium, France, Switzerland and Italy.

Many interesting dramas, comedies and scenic pictures have been produced by them during this time, having as their backgrounds many spots of historic interest and picturesque beauty, among them "Keepers of the Flock," "The Foreman's Treachery," "The Stroke of the Phoebus Eight," "A Daughter of Romany," "Flood Tide" and "The Coast Guard's Sister."

When Captain Rostrom, of the Carpathia, learned that the Edison players were aboard his ship he immediately made their acquaintance and spent much time with them. When the first dance was held after leaving Naples the Captain introduced Miss Nesbitt to a very polished gentleman of most affable manner, with whom she danced the tango and other of the modern dances. When the vessel reached Quarantine four detectives came aboard and, after closely scrutinizing the passengers, fastened their eyes upon the dance partner of Miss Nesbitt. He was taken into custody and then it was discovered that he was wanted in Austria for stealing $10,000 worth of diamonds from one of the leading jewelry houses there.

European aviation experts who declared that 4 a. m. and 8 p. m. or thereabouts were the only periods in the day when flights could be made with safety had their opinions discounted by MacDermott. As these hours were not exactly ideal for photographic purposes, MacDermott insisted upon flying at 11 a. m. He made seventeen flights in all during the course of the day, the first few flights being made expressly for the production "The Stolen Plans."

TARRYTOWN FIRE DEPARTMENT AT WORK IN "ACROSS THE CONTINENT" —PILOT

WHEN PLAYERS GET PEEVISH AND UPSET

The untoward eccentricities of the camera are often a source of much exasperation and hard feelings on the part of the players in front. Sometimes a particularly effective bit of work has apparently been registered, when suddenly the camera man ascertains that the record is deficient and it all has to be done over again. This is one of the trials of the motion picture artist.

An occurrence of this sort nearly put V. A. Potel and Lee Willard, of the Western Essanay forces at Niles, Cal., out of commission during the making and the taking of an exciting story recently. It was up in the canyon. The director had picked out a particularly steep and a particularly long and bumpy hill, down which, locked and fighting in each other's embrace, Potel and Willard had to roll. It was half a mile to the bottom, but they got through. They presented a pitiable spectacle at the end, but they had done their duty and smiled at the accomplishment of a deed well done. And well done it was.

The only drawback to the performance was the fact that, unknown to them, the camera had bucked. It was too late to make them hear the sad news, so thoroughly were they engrossed in their terrific and ever-rolling struggle. But when they climbed the hill again, the dreadful tidings were broken to them gently. It had all to be done over again. And it was. The struggle was not so strenuous but the progress downhill, over the fearful rocks, was, if anything, accelerated.

This time the record was perfect and so were the wrecks of Willard and Potel. They have not recovered fully yet. Willard says he feels something akin to a beefsteak after it has been through a meat-chopper.

MUTUAL ARC LAMPS READY FOR DISTRIBUTION

The Mutual arc lamps heralded by the Mutual Film Corporation as "The Sign of the Wing-éd Clock," will be ready for distribution within a week or ten days. They are special lamps with two Mutual clocks arranged opposite each other so that the rays of light will pass through them and attract attention to their brilliantly lighted faces.

The Solar Light Company is manufacturing the lamps and will forward them to the exchanges in lots of ten thousand. They will be distributed immediately to the theatres running the Mutual program, as will also the special banners which are being turned out in large numbers for the use of Mutual exhibitors.

SPECIAL FILM REVIEWS

"FEDORA." (Trans-Oceanic Films, Ltd.)—There is plenty of action in "Fedora," the new Aquila five-reel production to which the Trans-Oceanic Films, Ltd., 145 West Forty-fifth Street, New York City, has just acquired the American rights. In spite of its length, which includes a prologue and four parts, the film has not a moment that drags. From an artistic view-point the production is also superior, particular attention having been shown to the trifling details that often make or mar a subject otherwise of the best.

"Fedora" is not based on the French play of that name. Instead it deals with the illegitimate daughter of an English lord, his adopted son, the nobleman's tragic end and the love affair of the two, whose paths are cast together after his death.

The theme is handled in a fashion that is admirable. The acting is excellent and the direction of a character that shows a mastery of technique.

Among the scenes in the production that are worthy of note are a horse race, a duel, a battle underground between police and anarchists, and the rescue of Fedora when about to take poison upon the stage of the theatre where she is acting. The suicide of the English lord, father of Fedora and foster-parent of her lover, is an example of the artistic attention given to the scenic effects of the production, which has already been noted, and contains none of the grewsome details usually attending such portrayals. The nobleman is seen to enter a totally dark room, there is a flash of a revolver and all is over. The audience is made aware of his suicide by his adopted son's discovery of the body through the parted curtains of the room, although no glimpse is given of the dead lord.

"In Peril of His Life." (Kalem, Nov. 29.)—A conventional "Western" which is not up to the Kalem standard. The story is not very clear.

Bud, a cowboy, swears off drink at the girl's request. The foreman tempts him, but the boy, remembering his pledge, refuses to drink. The bottle is thrown from the window and kills the foreman.

"The Hand of The Law." (Warner's Features. Three reels.)—Made by the Colorado Motion Picture Company, and featuring "Tom" Tynan, the new warden of the Colorado state prison and the founder of the prison honor system.

Joe, a convict, escapes, but after a long chase is recaptured and brought back. Here he endures many punishments until finally Tynan's administration places him on the honor squad. He is finally able through a girl's assistance to prove his innocence. "Joe" Ryan, Jr., plays the convict and Josephine West the girl.

"A Daughter of Pan." (Warner's Features. Three reels.)—Made by Helgar Corporation and featuring Helen Gardner. Her clever work as Dusa, the girl of the woods, is the life of the play.

The tale itself is one full of fantastic and fairy story scenes and makes a most desirable break from the usual run of pictures. The girl of the woods has had a spell cast on her by the gods so that she appears homely. The wise man tells her the cure and she lifts the curse and returns to her woodland lover, forsaking the wicked courtier.

"The Unsigned." (Nestor. Two reels.)—Francis Ford and Grace Cunard play the leading parts. The story is weak and in places inconsistent. A boy, believing he has killed another, runs away. His sweetheart appeals to his father to help her, and he, to save the honor of the girl, marries her. The son returns during a strike and is killed.

"Bloodhounds of the North." (Universal. Two reels.)—James Neil, William Lloyd and Pauline Bush play the leads in this interesting picture of the Canadian woods. It tells of the fights between a party of crooks fleeing from justice and the mounted police. The mountain settings are beautiful.

"The Magic Veil." (European Feature Film Corporation.)—This is a dramatic story of love and intrigue of a character which constitutes the best type of melodrama. It has many powerful scenes, which are effectively staged and well acted. Throughout the story, which deals with the power possessed by a beautiful woman to ruin those of the opposite sex, runs the secondary theme, the love and then the bitter, uncompromising hatred of a Hindoo servant.

Irma Vallon, an adventuress, entices the high minister of the cabinet, Dauban, to fall in love with her in order to bring about his downfall. Leuvor, his enemy, who has promised her a large sum of money to accomplish this, does not figure in the story after she has effected the ruin of Dauban.

With this money, the woman leaves Paris, where she has gained her ends, and goes to Spain in search of other victims. Unfortunately, however, her charms are such that she has aroused the love of Ali, her Hindoo servant. Learning of this, she dismisses him immediately and in such fashion as to gain his undying enmity.

In Spain she poses as a wealthy widow and, meeting the Duke of Gervan, soon wins him by her wiles. Their engagement is announced. Dauban, who is still living, though disgraced, in Paris, hears of her attachment and sends her word that he will expose her before her marriage as a revenge for her treatment of him. Ali, her former servant, now selling rugs for a living, suddenly appears, and, recalling his love for her, she begs him to go to Paris and obtain the letters and picture from Dauban, by means of which he has threatened her exposure. Ali weakens and accepts her mission, but once away from her treacherous eyes, his hatred flames again and he determines to revenge himself upon her. He obtains the letters and picture, and, returning, places them in the hands of the Duke, who in the meantime has wedded the adventuress.

Seeing how he has been duped, the nobleman takes his wife to his ancestors' palace, which contains the magic veil that brings revenge to those who have been wronged by a woman.

"The Shriner's Daughter." (American.)—Like the recent release of this company, the American again has taken advantage of a situation and built up a strong story around it, giving us a splendid production. Their other film, "Trapped by the Forest Fire," was built around one of the conflagrations that occasionally sweep through California forests. The assembling of the Shriners in that state in their "Hands Around the State" tour, plays a big part in this film, not only from the story standpoint but also from the scenic and setting viewpoint. The view of hundreds of Shriners detraining at the station, the marches and band concert on the lawn of the Hotel Arlington, the drills, etc., all form an interesting part of the production. The story is not weak, as often happens in building a film around an event of this kind. It is well written, well staged and well played.

William Lambert and George Goodrich are partners in business and rivals in love for the hand of Anne Cortell. Goodrich's jealousy is inflamed after Lambert marries Anne, and he becomes morose, vicious and dissipated. A few years after the marriage Anne dies. Goodrich, passing the house a short time after Anne's death, sees Lambert leaving to go to a meeting of the Shriners, his child remaining in care of the maid. Watching his chance, Goodrich steals the child away and goes to a Western country. Lambert tries every possible means to find his daughter, but his efforts are unrewarded.

Goodrich, in the meantime, posing as the father of Helen, becomes sick and is visited by mission workers, one of whom, pitying the child, adopts her. Goodrich later tries to prevail on the woman to give the child back. Her love for the child has grown, and rather than part with her, she tries to buy him off and pays him a sum of money. During ten years Goodrich keeps on imposing his toll on the woman.

The girl, now grown into a beautiful young woman, enters a hospital as a trained nurse, where she meets a young doctor. He falls in love with her, but Helen refuses to marry him, giving no reason. The foster-mother also refuses her permission. Goodrich, skulking, appears in the background, and, beckoning to Helen, tries to secure more money from her. She is frightened but gives it to him and tries to hurry him off. He goes, but the doctor has seen him, so upon Helen's return, when he questions her, she tells him the story. He tries to overcome her objection by saying that he loves her for herself alone, but she still refuses.

Lambert, after all these years of grieving for his daughter, has found no means of consolation except through his devotion to the Shrine. He embarks for Santa Barbara to attend the convention of the Shriners. While attending the festivities, he is overcome by the heat. The young doctor, Helen's lover, who is also a Shriner, is the first at his side, and has him taken to the hospital, where he is placed under the care of Helen.

While Lambert is convalescing and being wheeled through the grounds by the doctor and Helen, he sees Goodrich and recognizes his former partner and rival, even through all the lines of age and dissipation. He asks the girl who Goodrich is. She tells him that he is her father. Looking into her face, he sees there the likeness between this girl and his dead wife. He takes his daughter into his arms and tells her the story. Goodrich is disposed of by due process of law, while Helen, the young doctor and her real father make a pretty picture as they happily piece together the story which has made up their lives. C. J. V.

"The Master of the Garden." (Selig. Two reels. Dec. 8.)—A story which has a strong appeal. As in the "Master of the House," the term "Master" refers to Christ. The action tells of a girl ruined by a young lawyer. She prevents a young girl from suffering a similar fate. The final scene of the girl's death and of her meeting with the Master possesses much strength. The court scene is also accurately portrayed. The scenes are not in the least enigmatical.

"Having a Good Time." (Essanay. Dec. 6. General Film Co. Exclusive Service.)—An impossible comedy which will amuse. A burlesque in the broadest sense. A sprained ankle and the town gossip cause lots of trouble.

"The Mirror of Death." (Lubin. Dec. 6. General Film Company. Exclusive Service.)—A few feet of exquisite scenery add much to this picture. The story itself is bright and interesting. The story deals with a girl stopping some revolutionists from killing her, with the aid of a mirror and the sun. The shooting scenes were poor, as were also the backgrounds.

RACING SCENE IN "FEDORA"—TRANS-OCEANIC FEATURES

INTERESTING FILM REVIEWS

Educational—Industrial—Scenic—General

"THE Birthday Ring." (Biograph. Dec. 4.)—A clever picture, which is not, however, true to life. A baby ring brings together a husband and wife after some years of loneliness. Plenty of action throughout.

"When Mountain and Valley Meet." (Lubin. Dec. 4. Two Reels.)—Romaine Fielding has a difficult role to play in this picture, and he is to be congratulated on the admirable way in which he portrayed his part. He is supposedly in love with many girls and is engaged to them all. His only purpose is a sinister one. He meets the girl from the hills and nearly succeeds in effecting her ruin. Her lover foils him.

"A Romance of the Hills." (Essanay. Dec. 4.)—A very conventional picture, containing little that is new or original. Fred Church plays the lead. A girl and a boy are engaged, when the former meets an artist and breaks with her first lover. They are reconciled later.

"For Another's Crime." (Reliance. Two Reels.)—Paul Scardon, Anna Laughlin, Irene Hunt and Harry Spingler play the leads. The story is very conventional and tells of two men so alike that one is accused of the other's crime. There is no need of the romance at the end, as it rather spoils the story.

"Romance and Duty." (Majestic. Two Reels.)—A drama which somewhat resembles "Beverly of Graustark," in which Belle Bennett and Ernest Joy are the principals. What the prince refused to do for his father he does for his country. A very fascinating love story, with excellent atmosphere.

"A Woman's Mission." (Melies. Dec. 4. Split Reel.)—The members of the Women's Political Union would not care about this picture. Woman's mission is "to love and be loved," if this picture is taken as a criterion.

"The Swan Girl." (Vitagraph. Dec. 4.)—A very dainty little love story that should meet with approval everywhere. A millionaire and a country girl meet; he aids her to get an education and finally weds her. Very prettily played by Anita Stewart and E. K. Lincoln.

"Big Bob Waits." (Vitagraph. Dec. 3. General Film Company. Exclusive Service.)—There is not a great deal of real story to this picture, but it is very pretty and will make a favorable impression. Big Bob, the sheriff, realizing that to arrest a man will send his parents mad with grief, decides to wait.

"Fat and Fate." (Kalem. Dec. 3. General Film Company. Exclusive Service.)—A Ruth Roland and John Brennan comedy. Ruth will not marry John until he reduces weight. He tries, and much fun ensues.

"Eileen of Erin." (Domino. Two Reels.)—A very pretty Irish romance. It is laid during the time of the Irish-English wars, and some very good fight scenes are pictured. Dennis and Eileen, after being in danger, escape and leave the country.

"The Cave-Men's War." (Kalem. Dec. 3. Two Parts.)—With the exception of one or two inconsistencies, this picture is very good and presents a new field of work. The makeup was realistic, except that one or two of the warriors showed their "tan" in spots only. The story deals with prehistoric times when the cave-men and shell-men were constantly at war with one another. There is a neat little love story woven into the main theme.

"Kitty's Knight." (Essanay. Dec. 3.)—A corking good comedy, with just sufficient slapstick work in it to make the action lively. Two rivals fight for the hand of their lady fair at a masquerade ball. The costuming is very appropriate.

"A Break for Freedom." (Patheplay. Dec. 3.)—An Indian story that does not possess any unusual features. A white man is promised the hand of an Indian girl if he will catch a murderer. He does this, but the girl escapes from him, liberates her lover, and together they go away.

"Magic Skin." (Victor. Two Reels.)—After the novel by Balzac of the same name. J. Warren Kerrigan and Jessylyn Van Trump play the leading parts. The action follows the story as written, and is of the semi-fairy story variety.

"Within the Hour." (Selig. Dec. 3.)—A very good story that will be sure to interest all. The casting is good and the photography practically perfect. The story demonstrates that much can happen within an hour.

SCENE FROM "TURNING THE TABLES"—LUBIN

"The Coliseum at Rome." (Vitagraph. Split Reel. Dec. 3.)—Same reel with "A Pair of Prodigals." Many views of these interesting ruins are given.

"A Pair of Prodigals." (Vitagraph. Dec. 3. Split Reel.)—Robert Thornby and George Stanley in their Sandy and Shorty tramp impersonations are exciting much favorable comment. In this comedy they go through a number of adventures, find a million and lose it again. Pretty girls add to the effectiveness of the picture.

"A Trip to the Famous Picnic Grounds at Arashyama, Japan." (Melies. Dec. 4. Split Reel.)—On the same reel as "A Woman's Mission." The "trip" is very interesting. Some very good pictures of the little yellow ladies at close range are obtained.

"Story of David Greig." (Imp. Two reels.)—A McNamara picture dealing with capital vs. labor. David, a newsboy, is adopted by Rossini, a political refugee. Later he becomes a great leader of men and is able to control the strikes. He inherits a large sum of money and buys half interest in the factory he had worked in. Joseph Moore and Jane Gail play the stellar roles.

"Beauty Unadorned." (Vitagraph. Two reels. Dec. 6.)—The best vehicle Sidney Drew has had in months. He evidently knows what he is capable of doing, as he is the author of the piece. A rollicking, clean farce comedy that would make a hit even in a morgue. Two adventurers try to arrange advantageous marriages in Newport, but a clever father outwits them. False hair, teeth and limbs play prominent parts.

"Pathe's Weekly." No. 74. (Dec. 10.)—A number of foreign items by way of change. Opossume in a parade in Grapeland are very amusing as well as instructive. The comic section of Bud Fisher was received with roars of laughter.

"A Lesson in Jealousy." (Vitagraph. Dec. 5.)—A story of the army that is very witty. Sidney Drew, Clara Kimball Young and Harry Morey constitute the cast. A woman wants a jealous husband and when she gets one she regrets it.

"The Padrone's Plot." (Kalem. Dec. 5. Two reels. General Film Co. Exclusive Service.)—As the name implies, Italians play the leading parts. It serves in a measure, as an expose of the modern methods of obtaining labor on a percentage basis. The story is well told and makes a good subject. The details are well taken care of. Black hand bombs figure in the action.

"Two Christmas Morns." (Gaumont. Four reels.)—A beautifully hand-colored release that will please all with its pretty colors and ingenious story. The character work of the two old tramps is particularly good. The story covers a period of approximately twenty years, beginning with one Christmas and ending with another. A human interest film.

"Her Father." (Lubin. Dec. 6.)—Should a person's relations stand in the way of an otherwise happy marriage, is the theme of this picture. The action is not, however, strong enough throughout to carry out the thought in entirety. Velma Whitman and Ray Gallagher play the girl and boy, respectively.

"The Octoroon." (Kalem. Three parts. Dec. 1.)—After the well-known melodrama of the same name which has been produced in numberless stock companies. The Kalem Company deserves great credit for this good work. The story is of the old slave days in the South and deals with the actions of a white man who loves an octoroon. The burning of the ferry-boat was presented in very dramatic fashion.

"Leah Kleschna." (Famous Players. Four parts. Dec. 10.)—The story of a woman's regeneration as so capably told by the Famous Players Company is far too well-known to need any retelling. With a most capable cast and good photography the drama "gets over" in a most emphatic manner.

"Baseball's Peerless Leader." (Patheplay. Two parts. Dec. 4.)—Frank Chance, though not as good an actor as he is a ball player, does very well indeed. A good supporting cast and an excellent vehicle are of great assistance in covering up what he may lack in technique. One or two small inconsistencies do not materially mar the action. Altogether it is a very satisfactory production.

"Voice of Angelo." (Lubin. Two parts. Dec. 4. General Film Company. Exclusive Service.)—A very pretty love story, well intermixed with a cleverly acted story. Arthur Johnson is here seen in a new part for him, that of a singer, who having arrived at the top of the ladder of fame scorns friends and becomes dissolute. He returns later, having lost his voice.

"Northern Hearts." (Selig. Dec. 5.)—Similarity in uniform and a general facial resemblance is apt to confuse the audience. The drama itself is one of considerable strength. An officer is ordered to arrest his best friend and he does so, even though it costs him his sweetheart's love.

"While Father Telephoned." (Kalem. Split reel. Dec. 5.)—A change of setting once in a while by way of variety would be most acceptable in these clever comedies featuring Ruth Roland and John Brennan. While father 'phones from a booth the door is nailed and the lovers elope. Same reel with "Andrew Carnegie's Gift to the World."

"Andrew Carnegie's Gift to the World." (Kalem. Dec. 5. Split reel.)—Same reel with "While Father Telephoned." Poor photography rather hurts the effect of these pictures of the Hague, floods at Newcastle, hop picking and the St. Leger races.

"The Footprint Clue." (Kalem. Dec. 6.)—A good drama showing the dangers of accepting circumstantial evidence as conclusive proof. The photography and casting is good.

"What Shall it Profit a Man." (Edison. Dec. 6.)—"If he gain the world and lose his own soul," would be the full title of this drama did space allow. A man steals all from his partner, mistreats his own wife, but finally repents. A very strong play.

"In the Elemental World." (Biograph. Dec. 6.)—The theme in this production is so tenuous that it is never apparent. The audience actually tittered in the serious parts.

"Broncho Billy's Squareness." (Essanay. Dec. 6.)—G. M. Anderson has one strong point in his favor. He brings realism into his interpretations. His reckless riding always wins applause. The story is on a par with former productions, being full of excitement. A reformed highwayman is the principal figure.

"Col. Heeza Liar in Africa." (Patheplay. Split reel. Dec. 6.)—Ingenious drawings by J. R. Bray, aided by witty sub-titles, make this a most acceptable offering. Very good as a novelty. Same reel with "Glimpses of Pond Life."

"Glimpses of Pond Life." (Patheplay. Split reel. Dec. 6.)—Same reel as "Col. Heeza Liar." A good educational production which was favorably received.

MARY AND HER DOLL

Here is Mary Fuller, Edison leading woman, with a doll which she dressed for the Christmas bazaar for the Children's Hospital in Birmingham, Ala. The doll represents Miss Fuller as "Billy" in "A Light on Troubled Waters." Of course, the energetic Mary made the dress for the doll.

MARY FULLER—EDISON PLAYERS

ESSANAY ACTRESS NOT TO RETURN TO STAGE

Marguerite Clayton, of the Western Essanay Company, denies with the utmost emphasis the story printed about her in one of the Hearst newspapers recently that she was anxious to quit the pictures in order to play a part in G. M. Anderson's new San Francisco playhouse, the Gaiety The story created a lot of gossip, accompanied as it was with a big picture of the pretty Essanay actress and a story that had about it many of the earmarks of the truth.

Miss Clayton asserts there's not one word of truth in it. "The pictures are my sole and only ambition," she says.

A CORRECTION

In the construction number of the Motion Picture News the Columbia Theatre at Portsmouth, O., was reported to be using a Mirror Screen. This was a mistake, as Mr. Fred N. Tynes, owner of the Columbia Theatre is very well pleased with the Radium Gold Fibre Screen he has installed. E. H. Hulsey, one of the most prominent exhibitors in Texas, has installed a Radium Gold Fibre Screen in his Houston theatre. Mr. Hulsey uses these screens in all his houses.

J. W. Ritchey on Posters

WITH valuable experience as an exhibitor in Chicago to his credit and an enviable record as a manufacturer of motion pictures, J. V. Ritchey, formerly manager of the Reliance Company, and now associated with Worthy Butts in the Greenwich Lithographing Company, knows whereof he speaks on the poster question.

While Mr. Ritchey admits that some of the "paper" used to advertise "special" pictures is not all that it should be, both in the nature of the subjects presented and their sensational treatment, he claims that the amount of objectional posters is small compared with the large majority of high-class and even artistic posters used in connection with the pictures produced by the legitimate feature companies and the manufacturers on the regular programs.

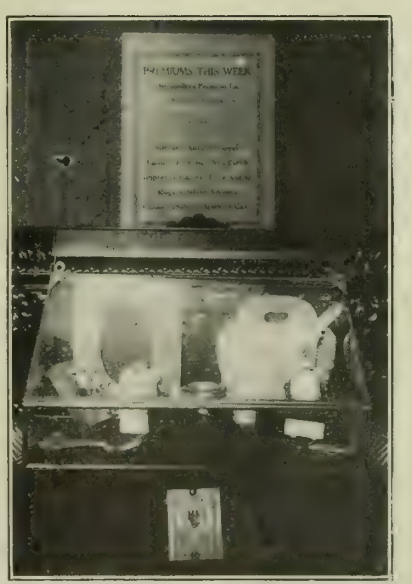
Since becoming active in the poster end of the motion picture art Mr. Ritchey has had an opportunity to study the ideas, not only of the leading manufacturers of regular weekly releases, but also of the leading feature producers. He finds that almost every poster produced is a reproduction of a still picture taken of an actual scene at the time of the making of the film.

The films are produced with the thought of the National Board of Censors requirements acting as a standard for the director. The subjects of the "still" pictures are selected with even more care, if possible, than is exercised in the making of the film. In fact, the very method used for the selection of the subjects presented upon the posters makes a separate censorship for them a repetition of the film censorship already exercised.

Premiums Bring Business

ONE of the most novel distributing ideas which interest motion picture houses is in vogue in the Metropolitan Premium Company in the Woolworth building, New York City.

Stanley A. White, who has charge of this distributing station in the East, is supplying more than one hundred houses throughout the States of New York and New Jersey. His idea is to interest motion picture proprietors with a class of premiums of a standard value which tend to increase the receipts of any house using them.



METROPOLITAN PREMIUM COMPANY SHOW CASE

This line of premiums has been of great value to those using them. In several instances, houses which have been run down by bad management, are now among the leading amusement houses of their locality.

This proposition is one that should be considered by everyone in the motion picture business who owns or leases playhouses. Many of those now handling the premiums are having such an overflow during the evening performance that they have been compelled to give matinee performances each day in the week and distribute premiums at these performances.

There are many dull nights in the motion picture business, as all proprietors know, and it is the plan to hand out these premiums on those evenings. The owners or managers of show houses get these premiums a week in advance so as to show the patrons the kind of articles to be distributed.

Mr. White, in an interview said: "On several occasions my proposition was not made plain, but after a short talk with the proprietor of a picture house, I soon had him asking questions, and soon afterwards had him signing a contract for the use of the premiums." J. F. F.

The State Board of Control of the State of Arizona has purchased through the California Film Exchange of Phœnix, Arizona, two Simplex projectors. These are of the latest model and are for use in the prison at Florence, and for the State Insane Asylum.

IN the afternoon several more managers of General Film branches were on the stand. They were: Alton Tredick, Oklahoma City, Okla.; Elmer R. Pearson, Omaha; William C. Preller, Minneapolis; Samuel H. Shirley, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.; Herbert C. Wales, Albany, and Chester W. Sawin, Washington, D. C.

On Tuesday the first two witnesses were exhibitors from Washington, D. C. They were William P. Herbst, of the Circle Theatre, at 2105 Pennsylvania avenue, and Joseph P. Morgan, of the Princess Theatre, at 119 Eighth street, Northeast.

Then came W. F. Kinson, manager of the Pittsburgh General Film Company Calcium branch. He was formerly associated with Richard A. Roland and James B. Clark in the Pittsburgh Calcium Light and Film Company, which was sold to the General Film Company. Then came Harry E. Nichols, manager of the Columbia branch of the General Film in Pittsburgh.

Tuesday afternoon the first witness was Fred C. Aiken, a special representative of the General Film Company, whose territory includes the Minneapolis, Omaha, St. Louis and Indianapolis offices. He was the president of the Theatre Film Service Company, of Chicago, which was sold to the General Film Company.

Next came several branch managers. They were Albert W. Goff, of Cleveland, with a sub-branch at Columbus; Stanley W. Hatch, Cincinnati, and Ralph LeBeau, Milwaukee.

Two witnesses on Wednesday were W. C. Brandon, of Atlanta, Ga., and C. S. Edwards, of Kansas City.

ing on a plan for the marketing of several exceptionally long subjects which the firm will soon spring on the market.

William C. Dowlan, late of Lubin and Essanay, is playing opposite Dorothea Farley, leading woman of the Albuquerque Film Manufacturing Company.

The thirty-two Sioux Indians of the Broncho motion picture camp at Santa Monica Canyon are said to have taken up the tango craze.

Thomas H. Ince, managing director for the New York Motion Picture Corporation at Edendale, has signed up the clever Japanese actress, Miss Tsuru Aoki, whose work with the Majestic company in "The Oath of Tsura San" stamped her as a real star. Mr. Ince has in preparation five dramas in which she will be featured.

E. D. Horkheimer, secretary of the Balboa Amusement Producing Company, will soon leave the studio at Long Beach, Cal., and take a business and pleasure trip East. He will not return to California till the middle of January.

George Field, the classy villain of the American Film Manufacturing Company, is reported as badly wounded by Cupid. The name on the arrow will be announced later.

Reaves Eason, also of the "Flying A" forces, has a mania for losing his top coats. Then he has to buy new ones, so the process is rather expensive.

Our Mutual Girl is getting busy. Recently she attended the races at Piping Rock with millionaires, among them August Belmont and Otto Kahn, director of the Metropolitan Opera House and a prominent member of the firm of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. These notables will be seen on the screen. Mayme Kelso has been engaged to play the society woman who is the aunt of Our Mutual Girl. Miss Kelso did the impersonation of Mrs. Jackson Gouraud, formerly Aimee Crocker, at the Folies Bergere, New York.

Gaston Bell, leading man with Majestic and Kinemacolor, has joined the Lubin forces. He will play leading roles in several of the Charles Klein plays which Lubin is now producing in motion pictures.

Now the secret is out. The editors of the Betzwood Lenz, the clever Lubin comic sheet, are George Terwilliger and Bennie from Lubinville.

William "Castle Walk" Bailey, of the Essanay forces, is receiving many inquiries from young ladies who want to learn the new dance.

The "making time fly" Mutual ad got the goat of the editor of West Side Men, a Y. M. C. A. house-organ. So he printed an editorial philippic against the phrase. Now the Mutual's advertising expert, Ingalls Kimball, of the Cheltenham Advertising Service, replies in kind via Phil Mindil, and the merry war is on.

Herbert Brenon, Imp director, will take a company to Florida to produce a feature starring Annette Kellerman. Billy Shay plays the male lead and Capt. Peacocke impersonates a fish.

M. E. Hoffman, publicity man for the World Special Films Corporation, was instrumental in landing a story, "The Influence of the Modern Motion Picture Drama on the Styles," in the current issue of a fashion magazine. Not being an expert on woman's dress, he enlisted the services of Agnes Egan Cobb, of the Eclair Company, to supply the technical terms. This is the first time a ladies' magazine of fashions has been used to exploit the motion picture drama.

Frank Bannon, formerly a New York exhibitor, has taken up his duties as one of Horace G. Plimpton's asistants at the Edison studio. He will be on hand to welcome all visitors to the studio and will preside over the sessions at 10 Fifth avenue.

Signor Novelli, who plays the part of the marshal in "The Two Sergeants," which the World Special Films Corporation is marketing, received his training for the stage under the eyes of the late Alexander Salvini.

STRANGE AUDIENCES SEE KLEINE'S "POMPEII"

Two strange audiences in the far West witnessed exhibitions of George Kleine's "The Last Days of Pompeii." The State School for deaf mutes at Vancouver, B. C., were recently guests of Mr. Kleine, and the same company, in charge of O. R. Henkel, also projected the big masterpiece several days later to the inmates of the Idaho State Penitentiary.

At this performance the governor, and many officials were present.

OZONATORS FOR MOTION PICTURE THEATRES

The importance of purifying the air of motion picture theatres is obvious. There are available many methods of removing foul air and replacing it by a purified product. Amongst these is the Universal ozonator, which is equipped with a blower and intended for installation in large dining-rooms, cafes and motion picture theatres.

The centrifugal blower mounted on the top of the case blows air into the air chamber, through the generating unit, thence through the grating and into the room. The blower insures a flow of air through the tubes and an expulsion of the ozonized air into the room.

The stability of ozone in the presence of organic matter, and its reduction of poisonous gases to less harmful compounds, make it a good air purifier. In air purification by ozone there is no question as to its diffusion and contact with the air content. It diffuses itself through air spaces and is brought into contact with whatever the air contains. There is no question, therefore, of its having to oxidize certain other materials or media before it is brought into contact with the substance to be oxidized, as is the case in the purification of liquids or more or less solid bodies.

The production of ozone, artificially and commercially, is based on the same principles as exist in its generation by the lightning discharge. An artificial lightning discharge of great area is provided by means of electrified plates surrounding a field under electric stress through which air is passed. Ozone can be quickly and conveniently produced by the discharge of air between electrified surfaces, and an apparatus built on these principles is in common use in this country.

The Universal ozonator is made by the General Electric Company, Schenectady, N. Y.

ESSANAY PLAYERS IN BASE-BALL GAME

The baseball season is never over in California. It doesn't have to be. Thus it was that there was a big game played at the Niles diamond between the Essanay Company and the members of G. M. Anderson's Gaiety Theatre "Candy Shop" company.

The latter suffered defeat, despite the fact that three of the leading ladies in the cast donned uniforms and proved that when it came to registering a bit they were quite as much at home on the diamond as they are upon the stage. These stars that shine in a double firmament are Maude Fulton (of the famous team of Rock and Fulton), Kitty Doner and Mazie Kimball.

PHILIP LEWIS ON TRIP

Philip Lewis, general manager of Lewis Pennant Features, of Chicago, has begun his homeward trip after a stay of two weeks in New York. He is calling upon the feature buyers and exchanges in Boston, Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Toledo and Detroit. On his journey East he stopped off at Indianapolis, where he made tentative arrangements with the Peerless Feature Film Co. to handle the Lewis output.

In Baltimore Mr. Lewis arranged with Mr. Steen, of the Tri-State Feature Film Company, for the Lewis features, beginning with "Taxicab 1098," to be followed by "My Boy," "Decreed to Die," and "The Sign of the Secret Nine."

CLEMENTS JOINS ESSANAY

One of the oldest and best known stock theatres on the Pacific Coast has lost a valuable personality in Roy Clements, who has just joined the staff of the Western Essanay Company at Niles, Cal., where he will act in the capacity of producer and director. Mr. Clements played the heavy for many years at the Alcazar Theatre, San Francisco.

"WILD ANIMALS" ON ROAD

"I am more than gratified with the success of 'How Wild Animals Live' at Carnegie Lyceum," says G. Blake Garrison, of Midgar Features. "The fact that a highly educational picture of this kind should have proven so successful in every detail convinces me that after all the intelligent public are ready and willing to support any really meritorious picture, even though it may lack the exciting sensationalism of a dramatic picture. I feel convinced that we will have the same successful results on the road as we had in New York, and only regret that road booking compelled us to terminate the New York run."

OFFER FOR "THE BIRD OF PARADISE"

Oliver Morosco is considering an offer from Thomas H. Ince, vice-president and general manager of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, for the motion picture rights to Morosco's Hawaiian drama, "The Bird of Paradise."

Mr. Ince is also negotiating with David Belasco for the motion picture rights to several of the former Belasco successes, including "The Darling of the Gods" and "Madame Butterfly."

SHRINER'S TOUR PICTURED

The California Shriners' tour of that state has been made a feature of the two-reel subject, "The Shriner's Daughter," produced by Thomas Ricketts, of the American Film Manufacturing Company.

The story was written by Julius Frankenberg and Thomas Ricketts, and has a strong vein of human interest told in a very forceful and convincing manner. The photographic quality is of the usual "Flying A" standard with Winifred Greenwood and Ed Coxen playing leads.

"THE ROSE OF SAN JUAN"

The customs of unscrupulous landgrabbers of early California days are vividly portrayed in the "Flying A" subject, "The Rose of San Juan." The story was written by Sydney Ayres, who also plays the lead, supported by Vivian Rich and an able cast. The production of the subject is by Lorimer Johnston.

"THE THREE MUSKETEERS"

"The Three Musketeers" in six reels produced by the Film Attraction Company required three months to complete. An indication of the care taken in staging this production was the long search required to locate a horse for D'Artagnan to ride on his journey to Paris. Dumas's description of the equine was followed religiously.

According to the story, D'Artagnan's father was a poor country nobleman, and the only steed he possessed was an antiquated white horse that had been in the family for years doing general utility work. This was the animal D'Artagnan rode to fame and fortune. That Dumas' conception of the animal was adhered to is evidenced on the screen, and it is hardly possible that such another quadruped exists to-day.

The horse seemed to enjoy his debut, for on days when he was not cast he would wander up to the studio and visit the many friends he had made. The old, spavined, wind-broken animal won the love of all the company by his almost human intelligence. His owner paid $10 for him and would gladly have sold him for that sum, but since the horse has become an actor, like other stars, his price has gone soaring.

NEW EDISON SERIES

In addition to the Cleek series, in which Ben Wilson is starring, Edison announces a third series featuring Mary Fuller. It will be called "Dolly of the Dailies," Miss Fuller appearing as a newspaper reporter. Acton Davies, out of the fullness of his twenty-one years of newspaper work, will write twelve of these "Dolly" stories, each one to be released on the last Saturday of the month.

William Wadsworth is to be featured in a series telling the near-matrimonial adventures of an over-anxious young swain. Mark Swan, famous for his comedies, will write these stories, the first of which will be released Dec. 29, under the title "Her Face Was Her Fortune." The series, each of which will be a Monday release, will be entitled "Wood B. Wedd."

Mark Swan is also writing another comic series, the "Andy" pictures, in which little Andy Clark will star. The first of these, called, "Andy Gets a Job," is to be released Dec. 31.

BETTY NANSEN
Great Northern Series

Betty Nansen, one of the most distinguished actresses of Scandinavia, will shortly appear in a series of multiple reel subjects presented by the Great Northern Film Company, of 110 West Fortieth street, New York City. All of the productions will be subjects dealing with the dramatic art which has made her famous throughout continental Europe, where she has long been known as the "Bernhardt of Scandinavia."

The first two productions in which Madame Nansen will appear on the screen in this country are "Princess Elena's Prisoner," and "A Paradise Lost." Both are four-reel subjects and will be released by the Great Northern Film Company on December 20 and January 20, respectively. Plenty of advertising matter of superior quality has been prepared, including photographs, elaborate lithographs and attractive heralds.

Madame Nansen has played many roles in her time and it was with difficulty that the distinguished artist was first induced to appear before the motion picture camera. Possessed of a stately type of beauty, she has sufficient versatility to present herself in parts requiring the winsome as well as the serious qualities of dramatic art. She comes from an old family of actors and followed early in the footsteps of her histrionic forbears. After many years of experience on the stage, she finally decided that tragedy was best suited to her abilities.

She has appeared in the Royal Theatres of Copenhagen, Stockholm and Christiana, and has made special appearances at other European capitals.

POPULAR ESSANAY MAN ILL

Friends of Frederick Church are much alarmed over the popular Essanay man's health. Night after night, Church lies awake with a distressing cough; and his days are rendered miserable from the same affliction. It is fortunate he does not have to make his voice heard in his work, because the cough has robbed him of speech and his throat and bronchial tubes are in a perilous condition.

Church is suffering the effects of realism in his acting. A short time ago he played the part of a consumptive hero in a new two-reel picture staged by Jesse J. Robbins. The exigencies of the character called for numerous paroxysms of coughing on Frederick's part, and the length of the story, coupled with the careful manner in which it was rehearsed, kept the actor coughing constantly for three long irksome days.

The artistic results were as gratifying as the physical effects were deplorable.

"Exchangemen and Their Troubles"

Is the title of a series of splendid articles to begin shortly in The Motion Picture News. We were greatly surprised to find, after reading some of the articles in this series already submitted, that there are so many different ways, as yet untried, by which exhibitors and exchangemen can co-operate to the profit of both.

It is really worth anyone's time to read these stories. The first will appear in an early issue.

SELIG SAYINGS

H. H. Buckwalter, that grand old scout who feels a sense of personal responsibility for the Panama Canal, having followed it faithfully with a motion picture camera even since the time of its beginning up to date, making a complete picture of the greatest enterprise the world has ever known, is again on the field of operation, grinding away as sunshine and fair weather permit. He writes from Ancon, Canal Zone:

"The rainy season is fierce. We can only get shots between showers and the thing that puts me on the bum is the moisture. An hour after I put in a new velvet it is wet, and the next morning it is mildewed. Film taken from the cans is soft, and in a couple of hours from the time it leaves the upper take-up box until it gets to the pressure plate it gathers enough moisture to be sweaty, like a glass of beer on a summer day."

Just to prove that there are herds of buffaloes still left and that a real buffalo hunt has not passed away, Eddie Kull, the camera man, has gone West armed with a double-barreled instrument of new make, and expects to return next week with a unique lot of film to show his adeptness as an artist and a hunter. The fortune of Selig in securing unique phases of life in the fast-vanishing West will be augmented with this addition.

Clifford Bruce, leading man of the Selig Polyscope Company in Chicago, now fully restored to health, is back at work.

Harry Jackson, one of the vaudeville entertainers, has joined the Selig force in Chicago as a producer, and will devote his attention to comedies.

Peggy Blevins, who has been associated with the Selig Company in California, has joined the stock company in Arizona.

William Farnum, the actor, was an interested visitor last week at the Selig Polyscope plant, where his brother, Marshal Farnum, has been installed as a producer.

Adrienne Kroell has returned to her work as leading lady with the Selig Polyscope Company, in Chicago, completely restored to health.

MANDELBAUM GETS "POMPEII"

E. Mandelbaum, president of the World Special Films Corporation, has just completed an arrangement whereby he assumes full control of the Pompeii Film Company, acquiring all rights for the United States and Canada of the Pasquali version of "The Last Days of Pompeii." From now on, this will be handled through the branch offices of the World Special Films Corporation as one of their features

JUST PLAIN COMMON SENSE tells you when you want to SEE yourself you use a Mirror. Because you SEE yourself better with a Mirror than any other means in the world. Now the same thing applies when you want to SEE motion pictures, use a MIRROR SCREEN because you SEE the pictures so much plainer, better and clearer on a Mirror Screen than on any other surface under the sun. Besides, it tickles your patrons and makes picture fans. It's a fact. The difference between a motion picture on a MIRROR SCREEN and any other screen of any other kind is the same comparison between seeing your own reflection in a fine French plate glass mirror and in a mud puddle. The 'MIRROR SCREEN' is a Mirror. A magnificent mirror made from the finest polished plate glass that the world can produce. Get Right and Write to us to-day for our new Snow White Prismized Finished Surface.

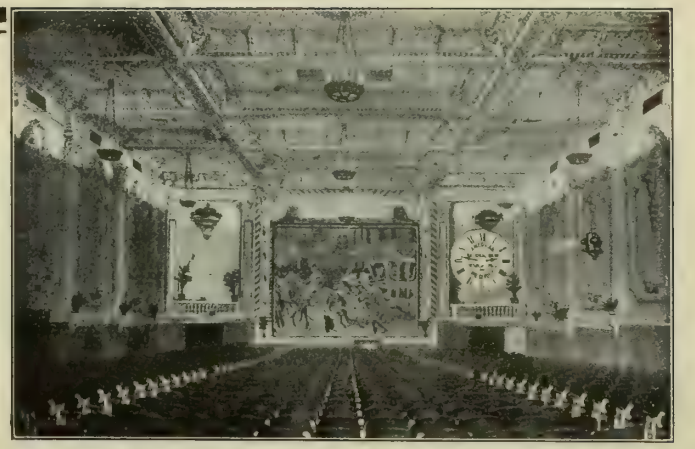
MAKE TIME MAKE MONEY

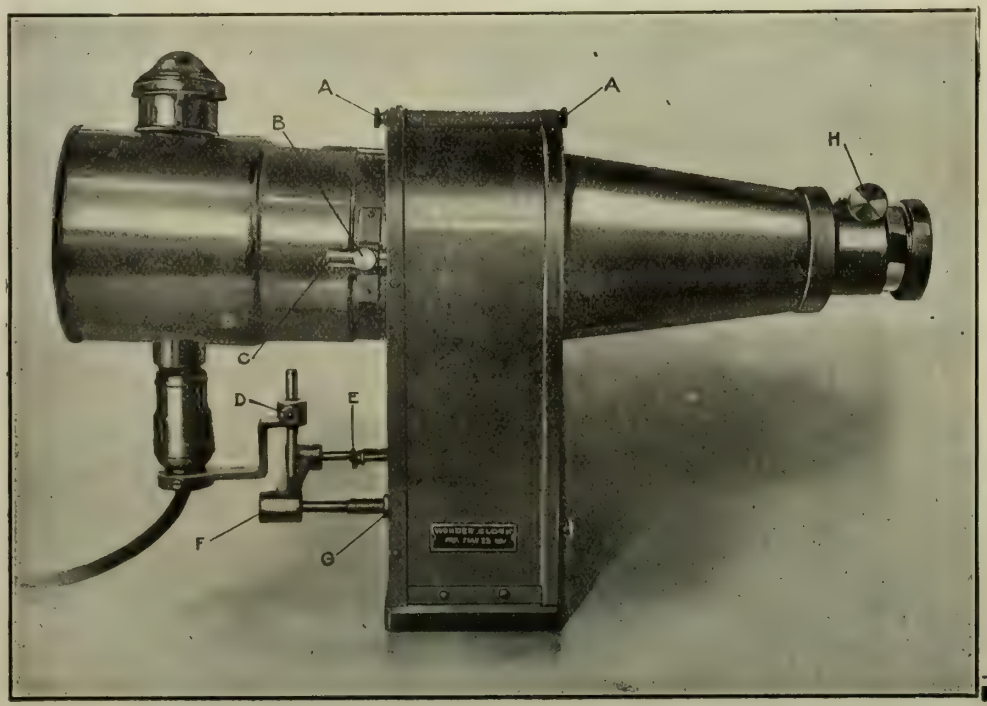
Harness the clock! Add a new, absolutely unique and startling money-maker, and a sure-as-fate crowd-puller. Imagine a tremendous clock on your wall or ceiling, with hands seemingly suspended in air, keeping absolutely correct time all the time, while an announcement flares forth from the dial's center.



Be an innovator. Now is the time to take a

WONDER CLOCK

It occupies very little space, and throws stereopticon clock face anywhere you want it. It takes power from ordinary socket. Amazes and amuses audience and always shows correct time. Requires winding only once a week.



Use the space on the dial for announcing features, or sell it to local advertisers and make a handsome profit.

Many theatres make the Wonder Clock their best advertising feature, while others make it bring a rich profit. Doesn't interfere with pictures; spreads no light over house and only illuminates exact space occupied by the phantom time-piece.

Write at once for special confidential rate, which is so low that no photoplay proprietor can afford to let it slip by.

MOVING PICTURE NEWS — EXHIBITORS' TIMES

Established 1913

Volume VIII — December 27, 1913 — Number 25

A Prophetic Christmas

THE year just past has not only been the biggest, but—what is more important—the most prophetic in the history of the motion picture.

A rather brief and very wonderful history it has been! And a very big year! Naturally. But what of its prophecy?

It needs little imagination to answer this. The signs are too apparent to any thoughtful person. But so stimulating are they that it is difficult not to observe the future as bewildering.

To take first the amusement field of the picture, let us briefly recount:

RIGHT now four leading theatres in Times Square—the centre of the country's metropolis—are contracting for an exclusive bill of motion pictures. Others, including the most prominent vaudeville houses, are hurrying tentatively into the field.

Some recent presentations in New York have definitely shown that from every artistic standpoint the motion picture can and will take rank with the drama and opera.

Throughout the country theatres costing from ten to fifty thousand dollars are being erected or projected at the rate of more than ten a week.

THERE has recently been produced what is obviously a flickerless stereoscopic picture; and there are notable improvements all ready to be launched in lenses, color photography, light, and many other important branches of the art and science of motion photography.

In the educational field motion pictures are already a part of the curricula of a number of universities, colleges, and high schools.

Appropriations being rapidly made by state and city school systems are in advance of the films and equipment they call for.

IN the industrial field: At an advertising men's dinner in New York the past summer—men controlling the huge appropriations of national advertisers—the sole topic of discussion (and it was impromptu) was "how to use motion pictures in advertising."

Many of the biggest concerns are already showing their processes and selling their products through the motion picture. That the field will be tremendously developed, that it has only started, that it will be worked out along the same legitimate lines as journalistic advertising is certain.

Here are three great fields of expansion, only one of which has been at all developed!

IT is now claimed that a non-inflammable film has been produced and that it is practicable.

What is more to the point, it is claimed that a substitute for cellulose, from which this film is basically made, will reduce the cost to one cent a yard.

All of which has led one leader of the picture world to state that the motion picture will soon become the daily journal, for the masses, of the world's happenings.

THE future is bewildering. No one of us can say what it will be.

Simply we know that this is the Christmas of prophecy, of untold significance for the New Years to come, of the picture's art and industry. W. A. J.

NEW YORK EXHIBITORS BALL A GREAT SUCCESS

Terrace Garden Filled to Capacity with Merry Crowd—Business Session Earlier in the Day at Which Delegates to Chicago Session Are Appointed TERRACE Garden, in Fifty-eighth street between Lexington and Third avenues, New York City, was filled to overflowing Monday night when the third annual entertainment and ball of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York, was held.

Previous balls have established this occasion as the gala night of all the year for metropolitan exhibitors, and many from up-state cities in New York as well, but Monday night's affair eclipsed its predecessors. From eight o'clock until an unbelievably late hour in the morning there was no slackening in the festivities. The exhibitors of New York, their friends and women folk, were gathered there and the result was very much worth while. A ball such as is seldom seen was held without a jarring note. The attendance taxed the capacity of both floors of the great hall.

Important Business Session

The ball proper was preceded by a business session of the executive committee of the New York state organization. This was held at the Hotel Imperial. One interesting feature was the taking of motion pictures of the delegates. At two in the afternoon the delegates were photographed in the street near the hotel. At seven o'clock three reels of pictures taken earlier in the day were shown at Terrace Garden. One showed the delegates grouped in front of the hotel, one of them entering the building and a third was of the crowds at Broadway and Thirty-first street.

The meeting was accompanied by a luncheon. Among the matters discussed were the ventilation of theatres, better fire prevention, a higher grade of pictures and uniform state laws. James G. Wallace, Jr., chief of the Bureau of Licenses, and Samuel Martin, chief inspector, were among the guests. It was also voted to send Samuel H. Trigger, president; Harold W. Rosenthal, secretary of the organization, and William Doque, of Utica, as delegates to the session of the executive committee of the International Motion Picture Association which was held in Chicago on December 18 and 19. Mr. Trigger and his associates left early Wednesday. This meeting was held in the Hotel LaSalle, Chicago. More than 100 delegates were expected to be present.

Coming back to the ball proper, let it be said in all fairness that it was a grand success. There was never a dull moment. One feature of the evening was the presentation of screen notables to the crowd by Len Spencer, announcer-extraordinary. All the available actors and actresses present were introduced on the platform as well as several magnates and notables.

Among those who made their bow were King Baggot, John Bunny, Harry Benham, Ben Wilson, Clara Kimball Young and James Young, Pearl White, Mignon Anderson, Irene Hunt, Glen White, W. T. (Pop) Rock, C. A. (Doc) Willat, Frank J. Carroll. Edward O'Connor, Joseph W. Farnham, and Fritzi Brunette. About fifty persons were introduced altogether. Representatives of film companies occupied many of the boxes.

Much of the credit for the success of the affair must be laid at the door of the ball committee, of which A. Coleman was chairman. The ball committee was really composed of several subsidiary committees, the roster of which is as follows:

The Committees

Arrangement: A. A. Corn, chairman; Peter Tisch, William B. Fulner, Harold W. Rosenthal, William Allen, E. Straus and Rudolph Saunders.

Reception: Adolph Weiss, chairman; Edward Valensi, William Hilkemeier, William Brandt, Rudolph Saunders, G. Koenigswald, P. Rosenson, M. Needle, William H. Hollander, T. L. Allen and A. A. Corn.

Printing and Badges: A. Bauernfreund, chairman; William Brandt, S. P. Weissman, J. King and William Landau.

Ticket distributing: L. Germain, chairman, and A. A. Corn.

Brooklyn branch ticket: L. Germain, William H. Hollander, Charles Fischer, Charles Henry, M. S. Feltenstein, William Hilkemeier, William P. Fulmer, M. Warshower, S. Frey, Irving C. Clement, R. Sanders, C. Koenigswald and M. Marias.

M. Needle was chairman of the floor committee and Frank A. Tichenor, floor manager. Assistant floor managers were Lee A. Ochs, Edward Valensi, Lee Lazarus, Hans Suckow, S. Echman, F. Goldfarb, M. Hirschfled, N. E. Block, Sidney Rothschild and F. Petters.

The officers of the Motion Picture Exhibitors Association of Greater New York are: President, Samuel H. Trigger; vice-president, Jack Koerpel; secretary, Harold W. Rosenthal; financial secretary, A. Bauernfreund; treasurer, Grant W. Anson and sergeant-at-arms, Robert C. Whitten

"Buster Brown" Comedy Series Coming

R. F. OUTCAULT, creator of "Buster Brown" and his dog "Tige," the famous cartoon characters, and probably the highest priced artist-advertiser and advertising business builder in the country, is the latest entrant into the motion picture business.

The Outcault Film Company, a $50,000 corporation, is now being formed to produce a series of one-reel comedies founded on the adventures of "Buster Brown" and "Tige." These will show "Buster Brown, the Cowboy," "Buster Brown in the Insane Asylum," and similar titles.

In producing the pictures carte blanche will be given the director. He may take the company wherever the action of the film dictates. Pictures which can be produced in New York will be taken until several are on the shelf, when the company will start its travels. The pictures will be released one a week.

The coming comedy series has a great asset in that it is well advertised by the daily press. "Buster Brown" and "Tige" appear in the Hearst papers in this country and in England, and are syndicated to other newspapers. So they appear in more than 100 publications.

Mr. Outcault, by his work as a cartoonist and advertising specialist, has an income rated at twice that of the President of the United States. He himself is backing the new concern, which is busy now negotiating for players and a director. The work of production was started Wednesday at the studio at 502 West Thirty-eighth street. Marketing affiliations have practically been consummated.

LATEST NEWS FROM CHICAGO

Operators Ball Well Attended

THE ball held by the Operators' Union of Chicago on December 10 at the Coliseum Annex proved to be the most successful affair from a financial and social viewpoint ever attempted by this organization. Practically every operator in Chicago and its neighboring towns and a few from nearby cities were there to participate in the evening's pleasure.

Everybody who was anybody in the business in and around Chicago attended. A number of exchange men and theatre owners were present. It is claimed that more theatre owners attended this year than ever before, which is another evidence of the harmony that exists between the operators and the managers.

R. C. TRAVERS

A number of the Essanay players were in evidence during the evening. Richard Travers, leading man of the Essanay Film Manufacturing Company, not only tangoed, but dream-waltzed, doing all these fancy steps with Miss Irene Warfield. Occasionally there was a glimpse of Don Meaney, the advertising manager, among the floating couples. Miss Sykes,, Miss Dale and Mr. Mainhall, of the Essanay Company, also helped to swell the crowd.

"Jack" Miller, Hal Johnstone and Morey Cohen directed the affair, while Al Stange looked after the comfort of the guests as they arrived.

The affair was very well conducted and capably managed. It marked the fifth annual ball of the Chicago Operators' Union and will not soon be forgotten. A very neat program was issued, which contained much good material, and also the pictures of many of the members of the union.

Richard Travers—Non-temperamental

Those who know him well call him "Doc," because at one time he carried a sheepskin about with him that entitled him to do first-class bone-setting. Perhaps the medical profession lost a good member when he gave up that line of endeavor, but it is certain the motion pictures gained a valuable asset. Besides being an actor Travers is a regular fellow, minus all those temperamental foibles that usually accompany a successful actor. He has played many parts, from carrying a spear to playing Shakespeare, and he has had his trials in the one-night stands and his glories in the metropolis.

Gertrude Spoor at Dinner-Dance

Mr. and Mrs. George K. Spoor will present their daughter, Gertrude Spoor, at a dinner-dance to be given at the Blackstone Hotel on Saturday, January 3. Miss Spoor was recently graduated from Miss Mason's school at Tarrytown, N. Y. It is said that the novelty of the affair will be a motion picture of Miss Spoor from the time she was a tiny tot up to the present day. Miss Spoor's coming out is attracting wide attention in the society world of Chicago. Since her return from school she has been the center of many social activities among the younger set, with whom she is a prime favorite. Miss Spoor is strikingly beautiful, and is already noted on the North Shore because of her musical accomplishments.

Entertained with Pictures

The electrical inspectors of Chicago were entertained after their banquet on Wednesday evening, December 10, with motion pictures, which were put on by Mr. B. W. Beadell, local representative of the Edison Company. The seventh reel of "Quo Vadis" and the second reel of "Love of a Toreador" were offered for the occasion by George Kleine; "The Terrors of the Jungle" by Mr. W. N. Selig, and "A Trip to Havana" by Edison. Mr. Fred A. Clark, of the Kinetograph sales department of Edison, projected the pictures.

George L. Cox Goes East

George L. Cox, general manager of the Advance Motion Picture Company, has gone East to close up a number of important contracts and other business in connection with his firm. Mr. Cox's present trip will include Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Atlantic City, Buffalo, Boston and New York City.

I. M. P. A. Give Dutch Luncheon

The third annual Dutch luncheon given under the auspices of the Illinois branch of the International Motion Picture Association in honor of the visiting board and directors of the association will be given at the Hotel La Salle ballroom on Thursday evening, December 18. It is expected that members from New York, Indianapolis and Minneapolis will be present.

Another Commercial Film Company

The Acme Commercial Film Company recently opened offices in the Fairbanks building. They have found in the few weeks they are established in their present offices that the floor space they have will not accommodate them. About January 1 this concern will move into new quarters, which will give them a floor space of about six thousand feet. They state that they have already secured contracts from several railroads and also from a number of industrial concerns. Members of this company are: James Cochrane, president; W. A. Baier, of Milwaukee; T. W. Combs; M. G Watkins, secretary and manager of sales and publicity, and D. A. McKinney. Mr. McKinney has long been associated with the motion picture business and is thoroughly familiar with the field he is entering.

CANADIAN FILM EXCHANGE IN ST. JOHN

Philip Kaufman, general manager of the Canadian Film Company, Ltd., visiting in New York this week, announces the opening of a new exchange at St. John, Canada, at 96 Charlotte street. The company, known throughout Western Canada as the Canadian Film Exchange, are the exclusive distributers of Universal films in Canada.

FIRST REVIEW OF "ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA"

BY C. J. VER HALEN

THERE are times when we all feel the inadequacy of word description to tell of some great thing that we have beheld. Something that the mind's eye can view over again in all its wonderful details and cause the same throbs of pleasure, excitement, awe and the many other emotions that assail the human breast when its agent, the eye, receives the impression of something mighty, something noble and inspiring.

In this newly formed creation, "Antony and Cleopatra," an emotion creeps over one, flooding the whole being, that makes it plain that one is witnessing something constructed to thrill the finer senses of man, that is wide in its scope and strong in its appeal. A realization comes that here is a production that will live and be enjoyed by the generations yet unborn.

Works such as these George Kleine attractions mark a great epoch in motion picture making and motion picture exhibition. They establish a turning point for the art and business of the motion picture and place it on a higher level, setting it well forward on the high road which leads toward the pinnacle of man's greatest endeavors. Mr. Kleine's efforts so far have given the world three big and powerful spectacles—"Quo Vadis," "The Last Days of Pompeii," and now "Antony and Cleopatra."

By the presentation of these photoplay marvels he has made possible a wider latitude for the motion picture. He has registered it in the world of amusement on that plane where it has long belonged. These efforts serve as an opening wedge, and without a doubt he will hereafter be guided by his far vision and offer photoplays of similar superiority, but of different appeal and different text.

"Antony and Cleopatra" has been built on the same large scale that its predecessors were. It, however, is different in its making. Its appeal is different, and its story centers toward different action, giving more of an individual interest to its two central characters. The acting of these two, their doings, their whims, their wishes, create the magnet around which the entire production whirls.

The play is big and bulky, employing several thousand people in its making. They are used to splendid advantage, but not to the point where they become boresome. We get flashes of vast armies and vast assemblies, of gorgeous palaces and beautiful women. Everything, in fact, that one might expect to find in the court of a mighty ruler.

THE storming of the city of Alexandria is a splendid big scene. The warriors, with their spears and ancient missiles of destruction, bombard the inhabitants of the city, tear down the massive walls that surround it and create havoc as they press forward in their eagerness to capture Antony. This fighting has been with both fire and sword. The battle is so intense that it is not noticed that the city is aflame. The populace begin to stream through the arched gateway, which looms high in the heavens, alone in its majesty. Back of it the flames and smoke belch forth and seem to scorch the very heavens, telling of a city's destruction that cannot be described in words.

The oration of Octavius at the death-bier of Antony is a splendid piece of acting. Antony, lying still in death, with his royal guard about him, is gazed upon by Octavius, now the conqueror, and brother to Antony's wife, who in this big moment forgives the sinner and salutes him as a brave man.

The action of the picture is supposed to take place between 30 and 40 B. C. It is produced by the Cines Company in the country where this history was made. It is correct in every detail, as we know it, and is a piece with history as it has been handed down to us. It is Roman history and it is made by natives of that city. The costuming is rich and the settings are elaborate. It is all, and more, than one might expect in the staging of such a bulky theme.

The cast is strong. Mark Antony is played by Anthony Novelli, the actor who played the big rôle in "Quo Vadis." Cleopatra is interpreted by Jeanette Trimble, whom we have so often seen in the big Cines productions. Matilde Di Marzio acts the part of Octavia, Mark Antony's wife. While her part does not call for a great deal of appearance before the camera, the time that she is on the stage is used to good advantage. Octavius is played by Lorenzo Lupi, a strong character, who stands out in all his scenes, especially in the Senate and at the bier of Antony. Charmian, a slave girl, is played by Ella Lenard convincingly. The titles in the film are very well constructed and appropriately placed.

THE film opens showing Mark Antony marching gloriously into Egypt after his victory at Philippi. He lands in Egypt and receives the messengers of Cleopatra, who arrive with presents to explain the recent depredations on Roman borders by Cleopatra's order.

Antony's arrival near Cleopatra's court is marked by much display on the part of Cleopatra, who promptly sets her feminine traps to capture the mighty Roman. This proves an easy task, for Antony, tired of his years of war and hardship, falls easily into the voluptuous ease that reigns in the Palace of the

Enclosed you will find your checks and papers which may help you buy some Christmas presents, and I shall use your $247 to buy mine. ECLECTIC FEATURE AT ORPHEUM, CHICAGO

The biggest motion picture theatre in Chicago, the Orpheum Theatre on State street, owned by Jones, Linick & Schaefer, booked and have shown on Tuesday, December 9, the three-reel Eclectic feature, "The Doom of the Ocean."

It is said that it is the first time in the history of this theatre that they have booked an independent feature. The film did a phenomenal business.

BALBOA STUDIO NOTES

Mollie McConnell, formerly of the Majestic and Universal companies, is now with the Balboa company of players. Miss McConnell was a member of the Frohman companies for many years and is considered one of the best known character actresses on the American stage.

Ground for the new Balboa studio at Long Beach was broken last week with appropriate ceremonies. H. M. Horkheimer, Edward Langley, Charles Dudley, Henry King, Madeline Lenard, and the other members of the Balboa company took an active part in the program, which consisted of brief speeches and patriotic music. The new studio will have a stage 50 x 100, a scene dock 50 x 75, and a property room 50 x 75. Work of construction will be under the direction of Mr. Langley. Adjoining the studio will be a garage large enough for five cars.

Frank Erlanger, formerly with the Majestic company, is now with the Balboa company. Mr. Erlanger is well known on the legitimate stage, having been for many years a member of the leading stock companies throughout the United States. Mr. Erlanger has made a special study of character roles.

BELASCO SEES "THE GOOD LITTLE DEVIL" FILM

Great Master of Stagecraft Views S. L. Rothapfel's Presentation of the Famous Drama Produced for the Screen by the Famous Players Film Company

"THE Belasco of the Screen" and "The Belasco of the Stage" met face to face last Tuesday, and, after a short decisive struggle divided the honors of their respective positions. The engagement took place at the camp of the latter on Forty-fourth street, and was witnessed by a large gathering of celebrities. S. L. Rothapfel, who has earned his right to the name "The Belasco of the Screen," deserves a great deal of commendation for the admirable manner in which he staged the exhibition. A short description of his method will not be out of place.

WOMAN GIVES AND FORGIVES: MAN GETS AND FORGETS

The large stage at the Belasco Theatre was crowded with floral decorations, where were seated a large orchestra, composed entirely of women, who rendered appropriate music that harmonized with the picture. In certain scenes the orchestra was silent and the audience was regaled with singing by an excellent quartet. The effect of the whole was one of much beauty.

If there are still any persons existing who do not acknowledge that the film can portray practically all that the legitimate stage can show, he or she has but to see this production. The original cast throughout serves to keep this play forever fresh in the memories of those whose pleasure it was first to witness it on the stage. Of course the possibilities of the film production are much greater than in the original and several scenes are added without in any way altering the tenor of the story.

The theme of the play is so well known to everyone as scarcely to need retelling here. The principal's tender love and care for his only friend, the little blind girl, will bring the tears to the eyes of all who see it, while the mirth-producing tricks of the boys at the school will make one's sides positively ache. Nothing is overdone, and, except for one or two small effects which might have been strengthened, the film deserves a place on a high pinnacle in the realm of artistic production.

Fairies in the popular belief are supposedly semi-visible only, and might have been shown that way. If, on their entrance, they had appeared by the double exposure process, instead of on wires, the picture might have been somewhat improved. The original production used the wire method because there was no other possible, but the film might have improved on this. To see the spirit of Charles, which at best should be evanescent, come bounding over the window sill, and then resume ghostly appearances was not effective. The settings in one or two places also might have been improved. The use throughout of trick photography in greater quantity surely would have helped.

The work of William Norris as Mrs. MacMiche was excellent. The expressions and character work were absolutely natural. Arthur Hill, as Rab the dog, was also very good. Of course Little Mary Pickford was perfect. That goes without saying. Ernest Truex as "The Good Little Devil" looked the part and registered some very excellent service.

The wonderful and beautiful love of Juliet for Charles, as shown in the legitimate production was for some reason not sufficiently emphasized in the film. But all in all it was the very finest thing that has been shown on the screen in a long time. The criticisms made are not of faults; they are simply suggested improvements.

ONCE UPON A TIME

Noble to Direct "Our Mutual Girl" Series

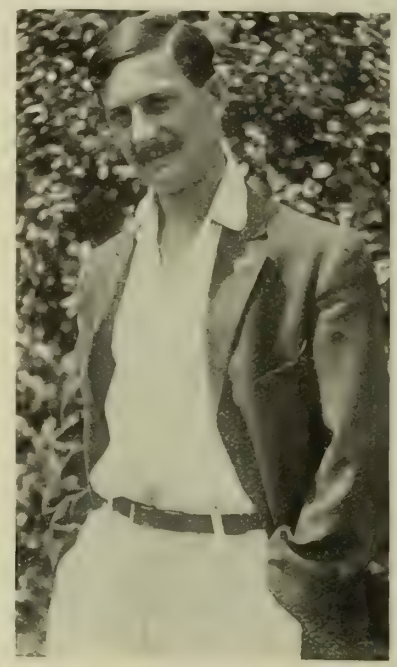
JOHN W. NOBLE, a veteran motion picture director, whose life has been as thoroughly punctuated with thrilling episodes as have any of the dramas he has directed, has been secured by the Mutual Film Corporation to direct the production in motion pictures of the "Our Mutual Girl" series. The character of this series is now well understood. "Our Mutual Girl," played by Norma Phillips, is the leading figure in a series which will show her arriving in New York from her country and visiting all the places of interest in the metropolis and mingling with prominent persons in all walks of life.

Round Mr. Noble, who will direct the series, is gathered the halo of a romantic career. A West Point man, he went into the Army, very naturally, and served through the Chinese and Philippine campaigns after the close of the Spanish war, as first lieutenant. At this time he collected an array of scars which make him look like a tattooed man when he goes swimming.

He laid aside the sword to labor with the pen and has to his credit several plays, among them an adaptation of "Divorcons," "In Old Manila," and an adaptation from the Hungarian of "The Marriage of Valeni." He has written several other successful plays and vaudeville sketches.

Entering the realm of motion pictures, one finds that Mr. Noble has left a long trail behind him. He started in stock with Thanhouser. Then he became a director. He followed this by directing pictures with Imp, Solax and other concerns, his latest connection having been with Ramo.

Among his best-known productions are "The Medal of Honor," "The Amulet," one of the first productions made in exposition of the Mahatma theory of reincarnation as introduced by Madame Blavatsky, "Cadet Life at West Point," "The Ticket-of-Leave Man," "Crime," "Two Men in a Boat," and "The Doll Makers." These are only a few and, in addition, he has many short stories to his credit.



NOTHING OSTENTATIOUS ABOUT HIM

Such, in brief, is "Jack" Noble, ex-army officer, actor, author and playwright. The productions which he will make in the "Mutual Girl" series will now be watched with a double interest by those in the motion picture art.

THE "WONDER" CLOCK

Many exhibitors have found the "Wonder Clock," which is manufactured by the General Sales Company of America, 347 Fifth avenue, New York City, to be a most effective device for attracting business. In many cases it also pays the exhibitor a handsome income, being used for advertising purposes as well as that of informing the audience of the time.

In reality the "Wonder Clock" is a unique combination of a stereopticon and a clock, which is put on a small bracket or shelf in some convenient part of the theatre and projects the clock dial upon a screen. The dial may be as large as is desired.

Over thirty-five "Wonder Clocks" have been in operation in New York City alone for a considerable period, while hundreds of others have been installed in motion picture theatres in other sections of the country.

"PREFERRED FEATURE ATTRACTIONS"

Betty Nansen, the distinguished tragedienne, will hereafter be featured by the Great Northern Film Company and will appear in a series of multiple reel subjects to be known as "Preferred Feature Attractions." The first of these will be "Princess Elena's Prisoner," a powerful dramatic subject in four parts, replete with thrilling situations.

Miss Nansen has been referred to as the "Bernhardt of Denmark," and she has appeared in the principal theatres of all the European capitals. Considerable urging was required to induce her to enter the motion picture field, but she has already become an enthusiast.

GONDOLFI JOINS LASKY ORGANIZATION

Alfredo Gondolfi, for five years camera-man with Pathe Freres, has joined the Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Company as principal cameraman and left for Wyoming this week to aid in the production of the "Squaw Man" which is to be the first production of the Jesse L. Lasky organization in which Dustin Farnum is to enact the leading role.

Oscar Apfel, formerly with Pathe and Edison, joined Cecil B. de Mille at Butte, Montana, this week, from which point they will endeavor to locate Maverick, the town in which Mr. Royle based the original locale of his play "The Squaw Man."

Tany A. Wamby, the original Nat U. Rich in the "Squaw Man," has been discovered by Mr. Royle and will be used in the picture.

"PROTEA" LETTER WINS PRIZE

The Cleveland Plain-Dealer runs a contest every week in which they offer a prize of $5 for a letter on the best motion picture offering of the week. The following letter which the World Special Films Corporation is very proud of, carried off first honors:

"The motion picture I best liked last week was 'Protea.' The picture moved with a great rush from the moment it began and there was never a dull moment in any of the 'mile of film' it was described as containing.

"The scene is laid in one of the small fictitious kingdoms which abound in modern fiction. 'Protea' is an extraordinary woman who intrigues with the police of Gottenberg to gain information about a treaty which means much to her country.

"Protea encounters and overcomes many perils in her quest; she seems at times hopelessly to lose, but in the end she triumphs.

"I liked this picture best because it was interesting all the way through, and that, I believe, is the 'first duty of a motion picture.'

"FRANK O'NEILL,
"4336 Archwood Avenue."

WORLD SPECIAL SUCCESSFUL

Three months ago the World Special Films Corporation commenced opening branch offices throughout the United States to handle nothing but large special film productions.

At the time many disparaged the idea and said the motion picture exhibitor would not and could not pay the prices demanded for long reel subjects. Since that time they have not only demonstrated the feasibility of their plan, but have proven that the exhibitor is anxious to get this kind of service.

THE GREATER LESSER

WAY back in the days when they were just beginning to do big things on the screen—between seven and eight years ago, to be exact—there was a youngster in a small San Francisco "picture" house, whose principal job it was to clean the films. Everybody called him "Sol," one reason being that Sol happened to be his first name and the other that it was just as easy to say as "Here, boy!" or "Kid," or any of the familiar forms of address, which are especially reserved for the small boy. And Sol is the name which almost everyone calls him to-day, although many things have happened since he spent those weary hours furbishing up the endless strips of celluloid in that antiquated photo-playhouse in the city of the Golden Gate.

SOL LESSER

To-day Sol Lesser, to give him his other name, is one of the biggest figures in the motion picture game in the West. He controls directly a big string of theatres on the Coast and indirectly through the Golden Gate Film Exchange, Inc., which he owns, perhaps three or four times as many more. Recently he invaded New York. In his offices in the Candler Building, 220 West Forty-second street, in that city, he has a well-organized, thoroughly equipped buying, advertising and managing force under the name of the Golgate Feature Service force, whose business it is to purchase territorial rights on the best features made, as rapidly as they are produced.

Before he opened this office, Mr. Lesser, or Sol—it depends on how well you know him, which you use—was wont to send telegrams to his New York agents reading something like this: "Ship at once via P. D. & Q. all big features released in New York this week." Sometimes this plan worked all right; sometimes it didn't. The accent is always on the "big" in the Lesser scheme of things, and occasionally his ideas and his agent's didn't gee in this respect. The New York office was the result.

Through it is precluded the possibility of bad investment. In future every feature purchased will be examined by the Lesser buyers, whose report will govern their employer's action. The establishment of this office will also facilitate shipping the films, lithographs, etc., and will ensure prompt deliveries to the clients of the Golden Gate Exchange. Doubtless the saving in expensive and trouble making delays and the superior opportunities afforded for obtaining desirable productions will be worth much.

TO go back to that film-cleaning period already referred to in the early days of the greater Lesser. As a start he acquired a small share in a failing motion picture house, made it pay, sold out, and from that as a beginning opened a small exchange, which handled principally "junk." Now he controls exclusive booking rights on the greatest number of the big features in California, Nevada, Arizona, Washington, Oregon, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming, Utah, New Mexico and Colorado, with offices in Los Angeles, San Francisco, Portland, Seattle, Butte, Denver, and Salt Lake City, which, by the way, is "going some," considering the fact that Sol Lesser is still this side of twenty-four.

His weekly film purchases have for some time past averaged $5,000. What they will be now that he has his Golgate Feature Service working in New York is problematical. It is a matter which concerns Lesser not a whit.

Quality is the determining factor in all the films purchased by him. The length of the subject is of no consequence—the bigger the better—and the cost is a secondary consideration. His equipment enables him to book successfully the most mammoth productions. He has his hand steadily on the pulse of the public demand and he stands ready to give the exhibitors whom he serves through his exchange the best that the camera turns out. He handles, among other things, the Exclusive Program products and his success with them has been of a character little short of phenomenal.

AS nearly everyone who is anyone in the motion picture business knows, Lesser is a quiet-mannered, slender little man, who gives scant indication of the organizing genius which is the underlying secret of his wonderful success.

Someone, by way of a joke, once called him "the greater Lesser." Perhaps the humorous person could have hit him off in no better way, if he had tried a week. He is all this and then a trifle besides. So we'll let it go at that.

CONSIDER THE CENSORS

OUT in Ohio a battle is being waged which deserves the attention of all interested in the motion picture business. The authority of the first legally appointed censor board is at stake. The Ohio legislature, at its last session, appointed a board to censor motion pictures. This move came after much agitation in Ohio headed by M. A. Neff, president of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America. So Mr. Neff and most others regard the present board as a protege of Neff's.

Now the question is whether a board so appointed and so constituted can long exist. The Board had hardly started getting in its work when the Mutual Film Corporation slapped a Federal injunction on it, tying up its work. Arguments have been made on the injunction but the final decision has not yet arrived. To the Mutual must be given the credit for carrying the banner in the fight.

But the fight is all too apt to have just started. Of all the problems which confront and vex manufacturer, exchange man and exhibitor,. probably no other has as many ramifications as has that of censorship. What with the national board, state boards, city boards and police censors, either a couple of police officers doing duty for the city, or the officer on the beat acting as censor, long vistas of persons vested with authority to make trouble confront the film man.

But why censorship anyway?

MOST persons feel with William Howard Taft, ex-president, and William Gaynor, the late mayor of New York, that censorship is unconstitutional. All are bound to feel a thrill at the phrase "any censorship is un-American." Think it over. We have no censorship of the press, of books or of plays except when they run afoul of Anthony Comstock or violate the laws of the land. Then why pick on motion pictures? The freedom in other lines was not obtained without a struggle. The fight for freedom of the press took centuries. Russia has not freedom of the press yet. But America has.

In many ways the censors are illogical. They lay down unwritten rules, like those of the Medes and Persians, barring the portrayal of certain things, mostly crimes, on the screen, or the exposition of certain indelicate situations and relationships. That is—these things are barred when they appear in the ordinary motion picture. But when the motion picture is an adaptation of a literary or theatrical work the producer can "get away with murder." Possibly the reason is that the censors fear ridicule if they set themselves up to alter recognized works. But where lies the moral difference between the screen production of a book or play and an ordinary photo-play? Why should one have more latitude than the other?

The censors themselves may not be of the proper mental calibre. Chicago film men regard the police censor situation there as intolerable. One argument is that film adaptations of famous plays have been cut without rhyme or reason. That returns to the question of adaptations vs. the common or garden variety of motion picture.

MULTIPLICITY of censor boards makes for confusion. First there is the national censor board whose action is legal in Massachusetts though the board sits in New York City. Then comes the Ohio Board, the first legally appointed board. Then police boards are springing up like mushrooms. The more boards the more trouble. The ratio is a direct one.

The idea of a censor board for every state is not one which will be enthusiastically received. The idea of making over an entire production for every state in the Union is not very pleasing to the film man. But this is a logical development if the Ohio board is decided to be qualified legally to proceed, as the national board is not an official and legally appointed one.

The hue and cry of the ignorant is responsible, at least partly, for this. The daily press used to delight in giving a petty thievery story or a childish crime a news angle by attributing it to motion pictures. Then along came the demagogue who cried for censorship. If the Ohio state board is legal there will be plenty of solons who will refuse to see their own state lag behind Ohio in the matter and more state censor boards will follow.

Again, why should there be censorship anyway? The manufacturers who are in the business to stay are big enough to look ahead and realize that clean pictures build for the future. The man who puts out a "smutty" picture ranks with the publisher of an immoral book or pamphlet. The police and Mr. Comstock will attend to him.

CONCERNING THE VANOSCOPE

By W. F. Herzberg, Director of the International Research Company

Editor's Note—So much has been said and written about the Vanoscope optical projector, some affirming and some denying the possibility of optical projection by reflection, that The Motion Picture News some time ago authorized the International Research Company to undertake a thorough investigation of the machine and make a report of their findings on the facts for the benefit of our readers. The standing and authority of the International Research Company in the world of science and commerce, alike, is such that The Motion Picture News submits this report to its readers without further comment.

The Motion Picture News,
220 West Forty-second Street,
New York City.

Gentlemen:

In compliance with your request of some months since, we have made an exhaustive investigation of motion picture machines manufactured and offered for sale at the present day, and at this time beg to submit a summary report which is but a synopsis of the great mass of detail which has been collected in the course of our investigation.

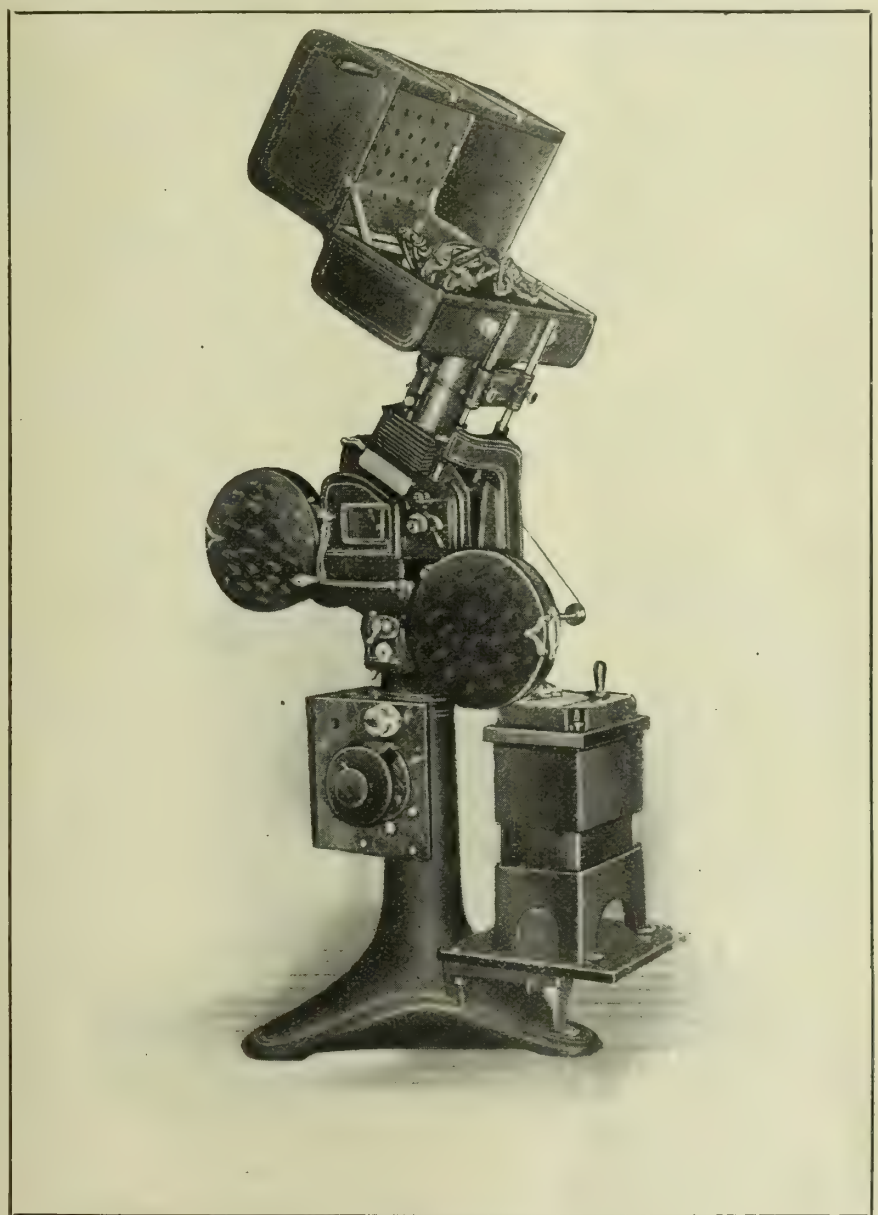
Our findings in the above can be summarized under a few general headings, viz.:

Mechanical Principles

The mechanical principles used in projecting a series of pictures intermittently at a speed of approximately sixteen per second, are, in all types of machines on the market to-day, dependent upon what is known in machines as the "Geneva movement" (in Cinematography termed the "intermittent movement"). This movement, variously adapted in connection with a revolving sector or series of sectors (termed "the shutter" or "shutters") is the basis of all existing motion picture machines.

In short, the film, on which is imprinted the series of pictures, is drawn across a standard aperture in the path of the light rays from an optical lantern; each picture stopping momentarily before this aperture by reason of the film having imparted to it a "start" and "stop" motion by means of the Geneva movement. During the travel period of the film the sector or shutter cuts off the light rays from the aperture, thus eliminating the film movement on the screen.

To realize the ideal in this principle of projection each picture should be projected for the longest possible period, and the changing from one picture to another should occupy the shortest possible period of time. When these conditions are fully met the result would be a brilliant picture without "flicker" (a term used in the art to denote the dark period produced by the sector cutting off the rays of light during the interval in which the change from one picture to another is made). Therefore these two functions in conjunction with an optical lantern, condenser system and projecting lens, variously assembled, constitute what is termed "the machine" and is either hand or motor driven.



THE VANOSCOPE

The Vanoscope's Construction

With the great volume of data before us, which our complete research into every phase of cinematography produced, we proceeded to investigate the Vanoscope, both as to its mechanical construction, soundness of optical principles involved, its adaptability for the purpose intended, wherein it meets the requirements lacking in projecting machines of the period, and its possibilities on the market.

We herewith summarize our conclusions and findings under a few general headings.

Both the large commercial machine and what is termed the "Junior" or "Home" Vanoscope were carefully inspected part for part and a careful study of the duty required of each part and its fitness both as to performance and durability.

The general design has been well thought out; and the parts of ample section to ensure rigidity in operation and perform with the least motive effort the function for which they are designed. The machine assembled as a whole consumes a surprisingly small amount of space in comparison with other machines of similar purpose.

The mechanical and optical principles involved in the construction and operation of the Vanoscope are absolutely foreign to any machine manufactured to-day, which precludes the possibility of paying royalty to a patent company in which the patents covering the essential features of present-day motion picture machines are pooled and for the use of any one or more of these patents the manufacturer pays royalty to the holding company. This feature alone represents a saving in manufacture figuring into thousands of dollars per annum.

Principles and Operation

First—As the machine operates without the usual shutter there is absolutely no interruption or diminution of the light projected through the film onto the screen. The elimination of the shutter precludes all possibility of flicker and the eye-strain resultant therefrom.

Second—The Vanoscope operates without an intermittent movement, therefore there is not present the jar and noise which is usual where non-reciprocal movements are in use. The absence of these in a machine eliminates the usual mechanical tremor which is transmitted to the screen in a magnified state and is evidenced by a blurring of the picture.

Third—As the film in the Vanoscope travels in a continuous, unbroken motion, the wear and breakage of the film are reduced to a minimum, thereby greatly lessening the cost of same and also the annoying stoppage and interruptions which at present exist by reason of the film being subjected at all times to the sudden strain and pull of an intermittent movement. A continuous moving film is a feature absolutely new.

Fourth—In view of the fact that all parts are continuously running, greatly reducing the friction in the machine, thereby consuming less energy to operate.

Fifth—As the projection of the arc is not brought to a focus on the film, it is possible to stop the film at any point without fear of ignition. This is a feature that is absolutely new and could not be accomplished on any other machine.

Sixth—In the Vanoscope the picture does not move off the screen from top to bottom, but one picture is dissolved into the other directly, thus always insuring a full picture on the screen 100 per cent of the time. Travel ghost cannot exist, as it does not become necessary to move the pictures off the screen at a speed of 16 per second or greater in order to maintain the persistence of vision. The Vanoscope projects pictures at eight per second and even slower without any visual perception of change from one picture to another. This feature insures an initial saving in the length of the films of 50 per cent and over, which in turn effects a saving in material, labor, bulk and transportation almost beyond estimate.

Seventh—The Vanoscope projects pictures with distinctly stereoscopic effect. This result is evidently obtained by the dissolving principle, by which one picture is dissolved into its succeeding picture, and projected through a common source of light. The pictures on the screen have great depth and stereoscopic roundness and completes the illusion of the existence of the object projected, which seems to be actually seen rather than pictured. When the Vanoscope projects one, two or three pictures per second it is impossible to see the change from one picture to the other because of this dissolving effect, and the more slowly the pictures are projected the more evident is this remarkable stereoscopic principle demonstrated.

The Market for the Vanoscope

Leaving out entirely the use of projecting machines for amusement purposes, there remains a vast untouched field in commercial and educational use. The use of the machine of to-day in these fields is at a standstill by reason of its being inadequate to meet the requirements demanded for these purposes. As the Vanoscope removes all the objections above tabulated and entails improvements and economies not as yet broached, we have no hesitancy in saying that in gauging the period of improvement in projecting machines of the past that the Vanoscope is about 20 years ahead of the times

Our full report, including all data collected and results of tests, is now in course of preparation and will be submitted as soon as it can be properly tabulated and reduced to writing.

Respectfully submitted,
The International Research Co.

Director.

A Christmas Trio of Vitagraph Plays

In keeping with the Christmas spirit, the Vitagraph Company of America is releasing three Christmas pictures this month: "A Christmas Story," "The Spirit of Christmas" and "The Ancient Order of Goodfellows."

This Christmas trilogy, somewhat on the order of the ancient Greek idea of developing a great dramatic episode in a series of three plays or dramas, portrays the Christmas idea from its three-reel, well-established and well-beloved aspects, namely, the dawn of Christmas in the birth of Christ, the spirit of Christmas, manifested through the lives of little children, coupled with the sympathetic desire of grown-ups to join them in their love of the open-hearted season, and the beneficent power of the Christmas spirit over the lives of everyday folk.

In "A Christmas Story," the first of the three productions, the birth of Christ in the manger is allegorically portrayed in a scene in which a daughter comes back to her father's house with her husband and their little child on a cold Christmas eve, and finding all the family asleep, spend the night in the stable, where they are found in the morning, asleep on a little pile of brush and straw.

The loving mother is clasping her baby in her arms, and it is through the child that she is forgiven for having married against her father's wishes and welcomed back into the family circle for this happiest of all Christmases.

In "The Spirit of Christmas," the second of the three, a daughter of the poor commits a small theft to buy presents for her little brothers and sisters. She confesses to the rich woman from whom she took the money. Her confession is overheard by the woman's brother, in whom there dawns a new spirit of Christmas. The girl is forgiven, and a happy Christmas is arranged for the little tenement youngsters when the two with all their wealthy guests go from their home with the girl and bring her brothers and sisters many pretty gifts. A thread of sympathy runs throughout this play which admirably suggests the ennobling spirit of Christmas.

In "The Ancient Order of Goodfellows," the last of the trio, it is shown how a man who spends his life among the poor performing his daily services as an officer of the law awakens to a realization of all the good men of his class and age may bring about by simply being kindly to those who need their assistance.

In all three plays there is a bright light of good cheer and gladsome Yuletide spirit, which is entirely in keeping with the idea of peace on earth, good will towards men.

THE NEWEST OF MOTION PICTURE PLANTS

Willat Film Manufacturing Corporation Is Building at Fort Lee, N. J., a Model Studio and Factory as Result of a Study of Leading Plants Here and Abroad

TO the practical producers in the motion picture business, to the persons who are constantly on the look-out for improvements and innovations in studio and factory construction, the large factory and studio buildings which the Willat Film Manufacturing Company is erecting in Fort Lee, N. J., are of great interest and importance.

To the person who is interested in the development and solidity of the industry and its every forward movement the new plant is also of interest. Its size alone guarantees that.

FRONT VIEW OF STUDIO

The factory, for instance, in which commercial work will be done in addition to the work of the Willat Film Manufacturing Corporation will have a capacity of a million feet of film a week. It will be the largest in the country with the possible exception of the new Lubin plant at Betzwood.

C. A. (Doc.) Willat, until a few months ago the head of the factory and laboratory end of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, is the head of the Willat Film Manufacturing Corporation. In fact, he IS the corporation. Mr. Willat is rated as the best technical expert in the country. In his own factory and studio he will embody his own ideas. He will do more than that. He will adapt for his own use what he considers the best features of the important plants of the world.

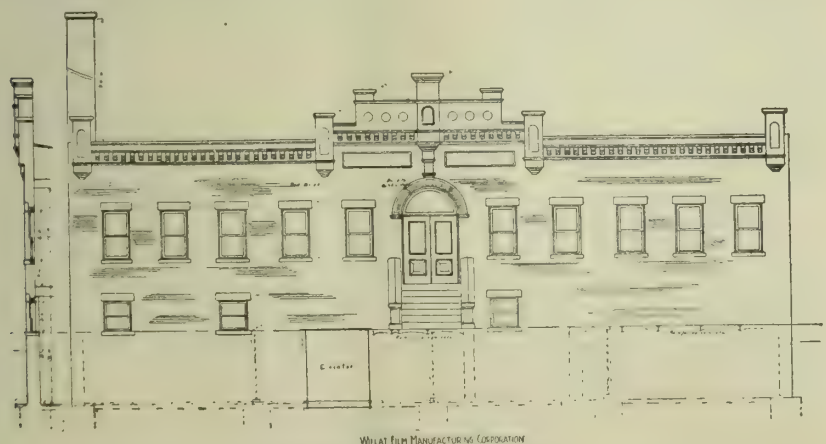
Trip Abroad for Ideas

Mr. Willat did not get his ideas of what the best features are of the foreign plants by sitting in a swivel chair. He went abroad and looked them over for himself. Mr. Willat visited the Hepworth, London Film Company, Ambrosio, Cines, Milano, Pathe, Eclair, Gaumont and other plants, in fact, practically every big concern on the other side. Like Kipling "what he thought he might desire, he went and took." In this country Mr. Willat has been familiar for years with all the big plants. So his knowledge of studios and their construction is both far-reaching and practical.

Now, at Main street and Linwood avenue, Fort Lee, N. J., he is erecting two buildings, a studio and laboratory. Each is 80 by 120 feet in size. The studio building is apparently larger, for running along one side is a smaller structure, 120 by 15 feet, which houses the dressing-rooms, scene loft and carpenter shop. This leaves the studio with unobstructed floor space 120 by 80 feet for the production of pictures.

WILLAT FILM MANUFACTURING CORPORATION

SIDE ELEVATION OF FACTORY



WILLAT FILM MANUFACTURING CORPORATION

FRONT VIEW OF FACTORY

Taking up the factory end first, many new departures are found. In the first place Mr. Willat will build his own cameras and his own printing machines. The rest of the mechanical equipment, including Bell and Howell perforators, will be especially selected.

In the printing of the positives comes the first new plan, and one which is directly opposite to way things are done at other plants in this country. In the printing Mr. Willat will put the strain on the positive, rather than on the negative.

To explain this technical difference is not so hard. It has been the custom in this country to make the perforations on the negative stock slightly further apart than those on the positive stock. Then when the two strips of films pass together through the printing machines, the sprocket engages with the negative stock, and the positive stock simply follows along. By reversing the process and making the positive perforations further apart than the negative perforations, the strain will come on the positive stock in all films handled at the Willat plant.

Wash Films by Spraying

The advantage of this is two-fold. It saves wear and tear on the negative which must be run through the printing machine every time a positive print is run off, and Mr. Willat feels that this process makes steadier prints, pictures which show less vibration on the screen. This plan of putting the strain on the positive in printing Mr. Willat secured abroad where he says it is in use at most of the large plants.

In the washing-room there is another important change. The washing will be done by sprays, not by the tank method. The ceiling of the washing-room, which will hold seventy or seventy-five racks of films, will contain many spray nozzles. Through these the water will be forced at high pressure, filling the room with fine spray such as an atomizer sends. The great objection to washing films in tanks is that the water is bound to retain some of the hypo and thus upset the relationship of the chemicals. With the spray method, new and clean water continuously reaches the film. This Mr. Willat believes of considerable importance, especially in tinted or toned films.

SIDE ELEVATION OF STUDIO

The drying-room will be far different from any other anywhere in that the films will be dried in an atmosphere controlled by an ice plant. This feature is not found in any other factory in the world, according to Mr. Willat. The air will also be washed before it is admitted to the drying-room which, when in use, will be practically a sealed room.

The air before it enters the drying-room is washed by apparatus installed by the Carrier Air Conditioning Company, of 30 Cortlandt street, New York City. The washing process forces the air through water which cleans it of all dust particles, and also eliminates all water from the air, thus making it clean and dry. By this process the air is reduced to a temperature of 60 degrees Fahrenheit or less. It is then warmed to 70 or 75 degrees and turned into the drying-room.

Hot Air Makes Films Brittle

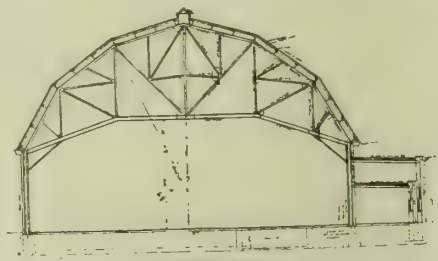
In this method Mr. Willat sees several advantages.

"We duplicate natural conditions," he says. "Films dry in the best possible way out of doors on a moderately warm summer day when the air is clean and the humidity is low. By artificial means we secure the same conditions in the drying-room. Thus we get ideal conditions.

"Many plants dry films by hot air which they keep circulating fast enough so that the celluloid does not take fire This method I do not believe in. I believe it makes the films brittle and apt to tear. Celluloid is a chemical compound subject to changes. A few hours drying in heated air ages the film as much as several months in the tin cans will. Thus the hot air method robs the film of so much life. By drying the film as I will do it the celluloid is not rendered brittle, and the quality of the film is always the same. That is to say that the fortieth print from a negative will be exactly the same as the first."

The printing and perforating-room at the plant of the Willat Film Manufacturing Corporation will be very large. This is for two reasons. The first is so that the operators may have sufficient air. The second is that it is easier to control humidity and temperature in a large room than in a small.

Another feature, and one which Mr. Willat worked out himself, is a revolving door between the developing and washing-room. Various methods of entrance and exit for these two rooms have been designed. Double doors with an intermediary chamber are in common use. The revolving door has been experimented with, but with no startling degree of success. Now Mr. Willat has perfected a revolving door which he feels will be successful and a time saver.



STEELWORK OF STUDIO

The capacity of the factory is a million feet of film a week. This is greater than any other motion picture factory in the country unless the new Lubin plant at Betzwood equals or passes it.

Big Tank in Studio Floor

"I do not expect to do a million feet of film a week," says Mr. Willat. "If I do half of that right along I shall consider myself fortunate. But my plan in building so large a factory was to be prepared for emergencies, especially rush orders. Now if a man wants 100,000 feet of film turned out in a day I can do the work."

The studio building, where the Willat Film Manufacturing Corporation will produce features, has a working floor space 120 feet by 80 feet. The studio is an all-glass structure equipped with light diffusers. On bright or moderately bright days artificial lighting will not be necessary. On dark days and if evening work is necessary, artificial lights will be employed. Plenty of Cooper-Hewitts will be installed and also arc lights.

The studio has one innovation not found in any other studio in this country. It has a big tank set in the working floor. This can be used for water scenes and also for trap-door work.

Such are the factory and studio being built by one of the master workmen of the motion picture business after years of study. They represent the most improved and approved in their respective lines. G. D. P.

POWELL BENT BUT NOT BROKE

Frank Powell, director for Pathé Frères, had an experience last week which he will not soon forget. He was looking for a location with suitable backgrounds for the finding of pirate treasures, and Crane Wilbur, the leading man, suggested his own birthplace, Athens, N. Y., a quaint old town on the Hudson. Mr. Powell shipped to Athens sacks of pieces of round metal to simulate money, but they went astray on the way up and the director was up against it for money to bury. He finally went over to the nearest bank and cashed a check for $450, all in silver dollars, and buried the sacks of real money on the river beach.

Mr. Powell, like most people, did not know that the Hudson for a good many miles up has a tide of considerable rise and fall. Busy with the details of the play no one noticed the water steadily creeping up the beach, and when it was time to dig the treasure up the spot was covered with water.

It was impossible to locate the place and Mr. Powell and his camera man had a long and lonely vigil of hours before the beach was bare enough for them to dig. Their identification marks of the spot had been swept away and the two men wearily dug up about a quarter of an acre of beach before they finally found the sacks. As they hobbled away from the scene of their labors Frank Powell said just two heartfelt words: "Never again!"

The Solax plant is rapidly expanding. A new two-story building is being erected and in it, when finished, will be housed the factory and laboratory. The added facilities will make it possible to turn out about 200,000 feet of positive film weekly instead of 100,000 feet as at present.

OH, IT'S AN INTERESTING LIFE!

Punctuated by GEORGE D. PROCTOR

JOT it down in your mental notebook, lads, that the ball on Monday of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' Association of Greater New York was the big social event not only of the week but of the season in film circles. It makes a fellow feel good to look over a crowd like the one that gathered in Terrace Garden and then be able to get off in a corner and whisper to himself, sotto voce, "I know that bunch. We are a part and parcel of the same great industry."

But there was more doing than showed on the surface Monday night. Secret envoys and ambassadors plenipotentiary were busy running back and forth with peace overtures between the hosts of the evening, Sam Trigger, Frank A. Tichenor, Harold Rosenthal et al., and the handful of Neff men who were present. It now looks, so the grapevine telegraph says, as if definite propositions for a cessation of hostilities may soon be expected.

Trigger, Rosenthal and Doque, of Rochester, were appointed as representatives to attend the meeting of the Executive Committee of the International Motion Picture Association, which was held in the Hotel La Salle, Chicago, Thursday and Friday. This meeting is the logical time for the International bunch to put their side of the case in tangible form and make a definite peace proposal. This proposal will tell whether or not Trigger's "Let us have peace" plea was sincere.

The suit of P. A. Powers against the Universal Film Manufacturing Company and Carl Laemmle, involving the ownership of the Horsley stock, to which everybody but Horsley has a negotiable claim, has been referred to Morgan John Gray O'Brien, formerly presiding justice of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court. Hearings will go on before him at No. 2 Rector Street, commencing December 22nd.

One actor who is rapidly and consistently gaining in favor with the fans is Darwin Karr, now with the Vitagraph Company of America. Darwin, who was playing leads with Solax up to a few months ago, is well equipped by nature to be a matinee idol. He stands more than six feet in his holeproofs and is blessed with an expressive face. At the Vitagraph studio he has been given good parts, including a prominent one in the six-part production of Mr. Barnes of New York. When it comes to the "regular fellers" of the game, Darwin may be counted in, too. So there you are. As actor and man he is one of the best.

The Gaumont Company is getting out attractive lobby displays along entirely novel lines. They are hand-colored layouts, twenty-four by twenty-eight inches, giving nine portraits or still pictures. The result is very fine. The color effect is soft and the whole thing makes a high-class display, good enough for a marble lobby inset with gold. The sheets will be prepared for future releases, but the number will be limited, as Sir Lorimore says they will be supplied to the trade below cost.

Charles Pathe, head of Pathe Freres, and Charles Jourjon, head of Eclair, are both expected to arrive from Paris within the week.

A halt has come in the taking of testimony in New York by the defense in the Federal suit against the Motion Picture Patents Company. Hearings will be resumed in Chicago January 6th and will run probably for two weeks or so. Then the scene will shift back to New York for the last words.

Augustus Carney, the famous "Alkali Ike," late of Essanay pictures, has gone with the Universal Film Manufacturing Company. He signed the papers over in Europe, where he is taking a little vacation.

Society saw itself in motion pictures recently. The polo championship films, taken by Edison, were run off recently at Sherry's before the real "400"; also the pictures of the baseball world's series, taken by the Commercial Motion Pictures Company. Washington society is going in for the same stunt and the leaders in the nation's capital have been showing each other pictures of themselves.

J. Stuart Blackton, secretary of the Vitagraph Company of America, who has been commodore of the Atlantic Yacht Club, Brooklyn, for three years, was re-elected for another year at the last meeting, held at the Waldorf-Astoria.

The Nicholas Power Company has an exhibit at the International Exposition of Safety and Sanitation at the Grand Central Palace, New York, from December 11th to 20th. It is the only representative of the motion picture industry at the exposition.

Winnifred Greenwood and George Field, two leading players at the plant of the American Film Manufacturing Company, at Santa Barbara, Cal., were married quietly recently. For a wonder the camera man was not on the job. Both will continue in "Flying A" productions.

George J. Cooke, Adam Kessel, Jr., and a party of friends sailed Wednesday for Bermuda by way of a little vacation.

Bert Angeles, who put on comedies for the Vitagraph for several years, is getting a lot of kind words on the four-reel feature, "Across the Continent," he produced for Pilot.

Andreas Dippel, the Chicago impresario, is getting into the motion picture business. He recently bought the rights to all Europe except Germany and France and rights to all the tropical countries for All Star productions for twelve months to come. Then he sailed away, ready to do business.

Enter Joe Hopp, of Chicago, among the country's biggest feature buyers. Joe, who has just been on a trip to New York completing arrangements, is furnishing a feature a day (some contract that) through his Union Film Company, at 166 West Washington Street, Chicago. Among the brands he is taking are: Ambrosio, Union Features, Features Ideal, Great Northern, Great Northern Preferred Attractions, Solax, Blache, Itala, Film Releases of America, Eclectic, American Kineto, Inter-Ocean and Apex.

With the erection of his new studio in Italy, George Kleine is now in the market for applications for the better grade of American talent to appear in his big productions. Mr. Kleine is willing to enter into contracts with the right sort of American artists to spend a part of the year on the continent in photo drama work for him. He is open to proposals from well-known American actors and actresses.

One of the envelopes it is a pleasure to open every week for the press agent's communications is the one coming from the World Special Films Corporation, containing Milton E. Hoffman's stuff. The Hoffman person has the rare faculty of "good copy." More power to him and his secretary, Dolly Ellisberg.

Among women in the film business who are making good in their own right count Anna Goldman, private secretary to Eddie Roskam, head of the Commercial Motion Pictures Company. Seven years in the business is her record and she is real head of things, Eddie says.

David Horsley, the American agent for Lumiere stock, is distributing among his camera men friends, of which he has a large number, strips of focusing film. There are, of course, quite a number of camera men in the country with whom he is not personally acquainted, but he will gladly forward a strip to any who desire it. This film should prove extremely useful and should form a part of every camera man's equipment.

The song, "My Movie Girl," by G. Warren Landon and S. S. Cassard, is being put out in attractive form by the Nicholas Power Company.

Acton Davies, by the way, is not the Edison scenario editor. He reads all scripts which have been passed by the staff and makes suggestions. Scenario editors should send all scripts to the Edison studio, as heretofore, not to Mr. Davies.

Changes are going on at the Lubin studio. Barry O'Neil, director, is no longer with them, his place having been taken by George Terwilliger, now a full-fledged director. The leading man is Earl Metcalfe, who has been working with Harry Meyers since his return from Florida. This first picture is a Charles Klein play, on which work has just been started.

This move is an advancement for both Metcalfe and Terwilliger. Both of these fellows and their talents are highly appreciated at the Lubin plant.

Stanley Lowrie, brother of Ira Lowrie, general manager of the Lubin plant, is receiving the sympathies of all over the death of his wife. The studio forces sent floral offerings.

Joe Smiley and Gaston Bell, of the Lubin forces, have just been elected to membership in the Screen Club. This makes an even dozen Lubinites who belong. Arthur Johnson bought a new suit for the Screen Club housewarming and is expected to buy a new hat for the ball.

Abe Siegel, of the Novelty Poem-o-graph Company, of Cleveland, is in New York. His company has just produced in motion picture, to be accompanied by the human voice, that famous poem, "Christmas in the Workhouse." It has already produced H. A. D'Arcy's poem, "The Face on the Barroom Floor." This met with great success.

Edward Schnaubert, Jr., will take over the Dreamland Theatre at Jamaica avenue and Oxford street, Richmond Hill, N. Y., on December 22.

The American Kineto Corporation has still a few states open for their two latest money-getting features. "The Waters of Death," three reels, and "The Girl of the Sunny South," four reels. The number of repeat orders this firm have received speaks well of the booking and attractive qualities of both subjects, which are backed up by really excellent advertising matter.

The International Motion Picture Association has filed a certificate of incorporation with the Secretary of State.

The purpose for which it is formed is stated as being "to secure uniform customs and usages in the motion picture business, to obtain equitable laws, ordinances, and regulations, to adjust differences among its members, and to raise the standard of motion pictures and further the interest generally of those engaged in the motion picture business."

The incorporators are Samuel H. Trigger, J. A. Koerpel, Frank A. Tichenor, Rudolph Saunders, Harold W. Rosenthal, Eugene Elmore, Grant W. Anson, and Robert C. Whitten, of New York City, and Joseph B. Friedman, Buffalo, N. Y.; William J. Sweeney, Chicago, Ill.; Charles H. Phillips, Milwaukee, Wis.; A. P. Tugwell, Los Angeles, Cal.; Fred J. Herrington, Pittsburgh, Pa., and Thomas Furness, Duluth, Minn.

Brevity is the Soul

Louis Goldstein, the head office boy of New York, has joined Sol Lesser at his Colgate Feature Service office. Louis will be remembered from his connection with Reliance, Eclair and Warner's Feature. He threatens to be a real magnate some day.

Jane Gail, Imp leading woman, sailed Wednesday for England where she will join George Loan Tucker's company, with the London Film Company.

Frank Crane will go with the Universal to direct the pictures in which Irving Cummings will appear.

A new publication has arrived, the editors of which do not aspire to be "oricles." Never heard of an "oricle." Maybe it's a cross between an oriole and a barnacle.

Herbert Brenon and his Imp company, headed by Annette Kellerman, have left for Florida. In the company are Leah Baird, William Shay and William Welch.

Frank E. Woods, scenario editor for the Mutual, says the best and most prolific script artist is Miss Anita Loos, the eighteen-year-old daughter of a San Diego, Cal., publisher.

The Mutual is sending a company to the old Kinemacolor studio on Sunset Boulevard, Hollywood, Los Angeles. Christy Cabanne is director, Joseph Altschuler in charge of the factory and Samuel Landers head camera man. Among the players are Miriam Cooper, Raoul Walsh, Frank Bennett, Fred and Robert Burns, Eagle Eye and Dark Cloud.

Fred Stanhope is with the new Mutual Studio in Union Square.

Frank Bennett, former leading man with Florence Lawrence, has gone with the Mutual.

Tom Mills will play opposite Norma Phillips in the "Mutual Girl" series.

The scenario and publicity departments of the Mutual Film Corporation are now at 29 Union Square West, Sixteenth street and Broadway. This affects Frank E. Woods, Daniel Carson Goodman and Russell E. Smith, of the scenario department, and Phil Mindil and Hopp Hadley, publicists.

George Patullo, the novelist and magazine writer, will write a series of scripts for the Mutual.

Henry Walthall, Biograph star, has gone with the Mutual.

Got a postal from J. W. Johnston, of the Eclair company, in Tucson, Ariz.

A. L. Haining, of the Gaumont Company, has just returned from South America after a very exciting time. He has visited most of the danger spots of Mexico, but looks none the worse for his trip.

Mary Fuller is writing an article for The Woman's World on "Thrilling Moments in the Life of a Picture Star." No one is better qualified to write upon such a subject than this gifted Edison player, who has made the courting of danger part of her daily life.

The Feature Photoplay's "Great Lure of Paris" is booked at Hammerstein's for an indefinite period through the Film Exchange. Hammerstein is advertising it as the biggest picture of direct importation from Paris.

Owing to the enlarged radius of action of the Selig Stock Company, with headquarters at Prescott, Ariz., the leading man, William Duncan, will, hereafter, confine his attention strictly to producing plays. The company will be very considerably strengthened and enlarged, as some big productions are nominated for this winter in the picture-land of Arizona.

The Countess de Marstini has joined the Pathe Southern Stock Company at St. Augustine, Fla.

For its release of January 1st, the Famous Players will present Cecilia Loftus in the famous novel and play, "A Lady of Quality," by Frances Hodgson Burnett.

Instead of the customary trailer reading "Mutual Program," the "Flying A" productions are being supplied with the Winged Clock with the hands quickly rotating and the now very popular wording "Mutual Movies Make Time Fly." It will probably only be a very short time when all subjects on the Mutual program will use the improved end piece.

In honor of the members of the Kalem and Edison Stock Companies who are wintering in Jacksonville, Fla., the Lubin Comedy Company tendered them a "Poodle Roast" and dance, which was held at the Lubin studio.

Those present from the Edison studio were: Herbert Prior, Mabel Trunnelle, C. J. Williams, William Wadsworth, Alice Washburn, Arthur Housman, Richard Ridgley, Richard Tucker, Bigelow Cooper, Elsie MacLeod and several others.

Kalem was well represented with Robert Vignola, Tom Moore, Guy Coombs, Alice Hollister, Marguerite Courtot, Harry Milliard, Ben Ross and Jack Macklin.

"THE BIG HORN MASSACRE" STANDS OUT AS AN EXAMPLE OF "HONEST INJUN" FIGHTING OF THE MOST REALISTIC CHARACTER

This great Kalem masterpiece in two parts will be released in the General Film Company's regular programme.

SCIENTIFIC PROJECTION OF THE FILM

By J. E. Robin, Sales Manager of Simplex Projection Machines

WITH the exception of projection, every branch of the motion picture industry has developed to a high state of perfection. This has been accomplished by taking each individual problem as it arose, and by known rules and formulas scientifically arriving at a correct solution.

Difficulties encountered with the present-day type of projectors, as well as problems arising in connection with the projection, may be solved in the same manner.

Carbon Carrying Capacity Limited

To project a good picture properly, it is essential first that the designers of the projecting apparatus have a thorough knowledge of what is required of a machine and under what conditions it will work at its highest efficiency.

There is a lack of sufficient technical and practical data and authorities for the architects, exhibitors and operators.

Nothing can emphasize this greater than the conditions which the writer has observed by personal investigation and practical experience since the birth of the motion picture art.

During the year of 1912 and the early part of the present year, more than 40,000 miles were covered by the writer, and during this trip it was indeed surprising to find that the majority of theatres were using carbons five-eighths of an inch in diameter, disregarding the amount of amperage they were using at the arc.

It is not generally known that the carrying capacity of carbons is limited and somewhat similar to that of copper wire. The tips must reach a point of ineandescence in order to emit the greatest amount of light.

To substitute this claim, the carrying capacity of five-eighths of an inch carbons is 34 amperes on direct current, and if 60 amperes are used there is nothing to be gained as the angle of light emitted is no greater in degree or more intense, and the carbons will be heated to a length that will even reduce the temperature of the tips.

Question of Amperage

There is another serious objection to be considered. That is the undue heating of the carbon holders.

It is clearly set forth that in order to obtain the maximum results with a minimum waste of carbon and electricity, the proper size carbons should be used for the amperage for which they were designed.

Another important element in reference to light is the various opinions as to what amperage should be used per square foot of screen surface.

There are several things to be considered regarding the amount of amperage to be used with reference to the above which are:

First: The amount of light, artificial or daylight, falling upon the screen.

Second: The kind of screen, the surface and also the position it is placed in with reference to the line of vision of the audience.

Referring back to the statement made in regard to the rules and formulas, it has been ascertained that when using direct current in a theatre illuminated while the picture is being projected, from .2 to .35 amperes per square foot of screen surface is necessary.

Condensing Problems

Alternating current has an illuminating value of about forty per cent direct and should not be used except through a rotary or mercury arc rectifier, as the amperage per square foot of screen surface varies from .3 to .4.

Another important element, which is a very interesting subject and upon which space will not permit a thorough treatise, is the condensing system and its relation to the motion picture lens.

The distance of the front condenser from the aperture plate should be set down in figures, as well as the focus of the front condenser.

In other words, the diagonal of the light must not be greater than the surface of the front condensers.

All of these various problems are related to one another and can be figured by proportion.

When the projecting machine is placed above the center-line of the curtain, the machine should be so arranged that the light rays will not strike the curtain at an angle greater than twenty degrees or thirty-five degrees on a throw of 110 feet.

At Right Angles to Screen

When possible, the machine should always be placed at right angles with the screen, as it will greatly assist in obtaining a perfectly flat field and a projected picture in equal proportions, bringing out the detail and perspective.

Space and time will not permit further details. Suffice it to say that cooperation on the part of operators and exhibitors and a knowledge of the subject will be of the greatest assistance in placing projection upon a better basis.

NOTABLES SEE KINEMACOLOR FEATURE

At the annual dinner of the American Museum of Safety, which was given in the grand ballroom at the Waldorf-Astoria to about five hundred guests Friday evening, December 12, the Kinemacolor three-reel subject "Steam" was a special feature, illustrating the development of this power from the tea-kettle to the locomotive.

Among the speakers of the evening were President Hadley, of Yale; Dr. Finley, of New York College; Surgeon-General Stokes, of the United States Navy, and Dr. Tolman, director of the American Museum of Safety.

Dr. Tolman, in introducing the Kinemacolor pictures of "Steam," laid particular stress upon the advantages of motion pictures both as an educational factor in the schools and as a method of teaching the very points for which the Museum of Safety was designed, i.e., the development and demonstration of all manner of safeguards to human health and lives.

A. A. Anderson, who is well known for his exhaustive work in connection with the educational movement, made some very timely remarks about the application of motion pictures in connection with public school work, emphasizing their value not only as an educational factor, but as a combination of education and entertainment.

The dinner committee, who arranged this novel program, included Dr. Geo. F. Kunz, chairman; Hon. Geo. B. Cortelyou, Hon. Elbert H. Gary, James Speyer and Dr. Tolman.

LOTTO JOINS BALBOA

Arthur A. Lotto, well known in the amusement world, has joined the Balboa Amusement Producing Company as personal representative to H. M. Horkheimer, president of the company. Mr. Lotto was for many years associated with the Kinemacolor Company and was responsible for a number of their great successes.

Vol. VIII December 27, 1913 No. 25

HO! FOR A GOOD POSTER!

THE plea for a good poster is almost universal. American films, on the average already of a quality distinctly superior, show a steady improvement, which is almost noticeable from week to week, yet the posters advertising them, with rare exceptions, are of a grade little better, comparatively, than those in vogue when the motion picture was in its infancy.

Every exhibitor, who thinks at all, recognizes this fact. In proportion as he does so, he resents it. Yet thus far he has been powerless to alter or improve the condition that confronted him. That good posters mean good business is a fact that is self-evident, providing, of course, the production is of corresponding excellence. But that a good production cannot have justice done it at the box office if the posters advertising it are inferior, is also apparent. The exhibition is the loser either way.

The first question that rises to the mind is, why, after spending a small fortune on production, and having produced a film of genuine artistic excellence, the poster which makes the first appeal to the real client, the public, only impresses one with its very obvious cheapness, and does little to create a desire to see the film? With competition getting keener every day, this appears to be one direction in which the enterprising producer can pull out ahead of his rivals.

Do producers look upon the poster as a necessary evil, an extra expense tacked on to the tail of production, and therefore get it done as cheaply as possible? It looks very much like it.

You can't do without posters! Then why not make them real live attractions; something that will make the public want to see your film?

THE theatrical producer has found it out long ago. He must have the best of posters. One has only to mention the beautiful productions of David Belasco to prove it.

The title of the film, though it is important to have a good one, is not a decisive factor. Take any dozen you like; they don't convey much to the public mind; but a poster picturing the dramatic moment, the heart of the plot, the sensational incident, that is the lure, the bait, that decides Mr. and Mrs. Smith and family to visit the house showing that film. With two, three, and four picture houses within easy reach of the home, the matter of immediate appeal becomes of vital moment to producer and exhibitor alike; their interests are the same.

American producers will ultimately come to it, and demand the best posters that money can buy. European film manufacturers are doing better than we are, and it is a matter of reproach that we are behind. To order your supply of posters two or three days before putting your production on the market, and allowing the printer to produce them from a square inch of film, and deliver them, not quite dry, in time to go out with the first order is one way of doing business, but surely a bad one for all concerned.

OF course, the printer wants to make as much out of his printing as possible, so he dispenses with a sketch altogether, and produces from the above-mentioned square inch of film, or at best he pays an artist $10 or $15 to make a sketch—and "Let me have it to-morrow" goes with the order. He gets what he is asking for. The renter is out to buy cheap and sell dear. So his influence does not tend to lift the standard.

One producer was bold enough to say he could not get good posters. Of course he can't at the price he is willing to pay. He knows he can't get leading actors at the price of third-rate men, but he doesn't apply the same knowledge to the matter of printing and posters. It is all a matter of price. Would it not be good business to pay it and get something that is worth while?

AMERICAN FILM'S RELEASE DATES

On Monday of each week the American Film Manufacturing Company will release a two-part feature, and once each month the two-part subject will be replaced with a three-part production.

PRODUCE DRAMA AT NIAGARA FALL

Daily newspapers at Niagara Falls, New York, report the staging there of a sensational motion picture play by the Sterling Camera and Film Company, of New York.

The plot of the play, which is a four-reel subject, centers around an attempt to smuggle Chinese across the border. In one scene a large touring car in which the smugglers are trying to escape the government detectives, is hit by a freight train.

The film will end with the girl closed in a barrel and sent over Niagara Falls. These scenes also show splendid views of the falls. Violet Stuart plays the girl. August Collette is the leading man, Arthur Donaldson is the director and Leon Wagner, the camera man.

NEW PILOT PRODUCTION

Director James Gordon of the Pilot Company has just completed assembling and putting in shape their latest feature production "Hoodman Blind," from Henry Arthur Jones' famous English drama, which was originally played by the well-known star, Wilson Barrett. The story is laid around London, and the English atmosphere is sustained throughout.

Miss Harbe plays a dual role, that of twin sisters, and one of the most interesting scenes, obtained by a double exposure, is where she enters a room and greets herself. Among other well-known artists in this production are Herbert Barrington, Mrs. Guy Standing, and Violet Stuart.

The Day and Night Screen

Its Invention Opens New Field for Exhibitors and Will Prove a Means of Increasing Business

ALTHOUGH the "Day and Night" screen, so-called because it can be used effectively in daylight as well as in the dark, has been in the field here for only a short time, it has thus far so successfully demonstrated its merit, that many of the leading motion picture houses throughout the country have installed it. Hitherto there has been a certain prejudice against patent screens, due largely to the loss of clearness and detail in the picture when viewed from the sides of the theatre and also because it has been found necessary to use frequent applications of paint or some special preparation to maintain the screen's efficiency.

All these objections are obviated by the process under which the "Day and Night" screen is produced. The picture, when projected is quite as clear and distinct, when viewed from the sides of the theatre, as when seen from a point directly in front of it. In addition to this, as far as the tests have shown, the screen is practically unaffected by time, weather or house conditions.

One of the remarkable features of the screen is its almost entire failure to use up light by absorption, a characteristic which results not only in making daylight pictures possible, but also in a considerable saving of electric current. In Germany, where the screen was invented, the cost of electricity is much higher than it is here and this saving is so great, that a lease arrangement is made between the manufacturers of the screens and the exhibitor, whereby the latter pays half the amount saved in current as rental for the screen. The manufacturers obtain the electricity account for the three months prior to the installation of the "Day and Night" screen, on which they base their calculations, and the resultant saving is usually found to be between 50 and 60 per cent of the former cost of the electricity. This amount is divided, giving the exhibitor a comfortable profit and the screen company a substantial rent.

Although the "Day and Night" screen was invented in Germany, it was first introduced to the world by England, where it is now installed in practically all the leading motion picture houses in the United Kingdom. Germany and France speedily followed England's lead.

The American company, which was formed a few months ago under the name Day and Night Screens, Inc. with offices at 291 Broadway, New York City, has already had great success in of this screen—open air picture entertainment in the day time. Neither murky atmospheric conditions, nor bright sunshine interferes with its effectiveness.

placing its product in many of the leading theatres in this country. The Gaumont Company employed it when demonstrating their color photography at the Thirty-ninth street theatre in New York City last spring, bringing a "Day and Night" screen from their French studio especially for the purpose of the exhibition. The Kinemacolor Company used it in their demonstration theatre at the Exposition at the Grand Central Palace in New York City last July and many other film companies are using them in their private demonstration rooms.

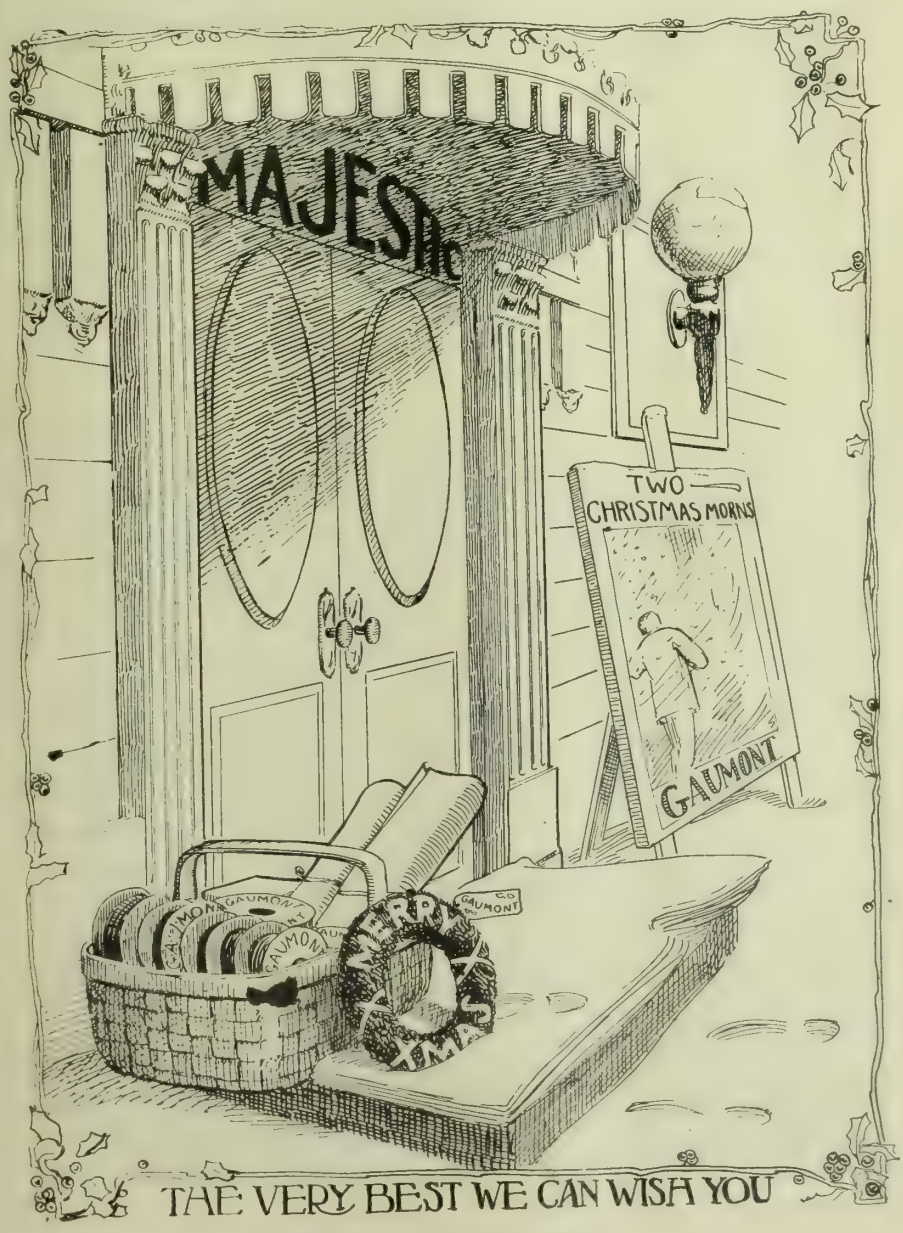
A new field is opened up by the use

PRIVATE WIRE FOR PATHE

A private wire has been installed for Pathe's Weekly in the main office of the company at Jersey City. Since the Weekly has been issued twice a week the number of telegraph messages has become so large that to get better and more prompt service the private wire became a necessity.

INSTAL FILTERS

The American Film Manufacturing Company has just installed a large battery of water filters in its Chicago laboratories. The capacity of the filters will allow the use of 10,000 gallons of filtered water per hour. The new equipment is calculated to improve the already high quality of the American pictures.



THE VERSATILITY OF THE MOTION PICTURE

By William Barry, Advertising Manager of the Nicholas Power Company

MOTION pictures have been in more or less extensive public use since 1895, but until 1905 their use was comparatively limited. They were for many years a part of the equipment of practically all vaudeville theatres, but were not featured as special attractions in the programs of these theatres, being used primarily to dismiss the audience. For this reason they were presented with little care and with less effort to supply scenes of great interest.

In addition to the use of the machines in theatres of this character, their only use up to 1905 was to add attractiveness and vitality to travel lectures or as adjuncts to the shows of itinerant showmen. Between 1905 and 1908, however, the motion-picture machine had developed into an instrument adapted not only for entertainment purposes, but also for educational uses, the latter being one which has steadily grown and is still growing.

The use of motion-picture machines by educational institutions is not due to the entertainment value of the pictures alone, as many facts of natural science can be presented by means of the motion picture far more effectively than in any other way. The value of the motion picture as a means of teaching surgery will be readily appreciated, as in no other way can the technique of a difficult operation, as performed by a master surgeon, be portrayed to innumerable students after the operation has taken place.

CONSIDERED as a commercial proposition alone, motion pictures as a means of entertainment may be counted on to yield handsome profits for many years, disregarding their increasing use for educational purposes. The motion picture is not a fad. Unlike fads and crazes, the motion picture enthusiasm is not based upon a single, unchanging source of pleasure, but represents an endless variety of themes.

As has been well said by an American student of sociology, the vitality of the motion picture as a means of entertainment is assured, because it gives to audiences, who cannot afford the pleasures of the theatre at regular theatre prices, practically the same emotions and interests as are presented by the ordinary play.

Another aspect of the motion picture as a form of entertainment which is worthy of mention is the uplifting influence upon the people who habitually attend the motion-picture theatre. The films which are now being presented are, almost without exception, entirely free from any objectionable element. The audiences catered to are composed largely of women and children, and it should be the aim of every exhibitor to present shows to which no exception can be taken by any one.

THE motion picture has been made an adjunct of the Salvation Army, the Y. M. C. A., and of many churches for the development of social intercourse. Perfect projection is the foundation upon which the development of motion pictures has been based. The effect on the human eye of a flickering picture has been found in some cases to be such as to cause illness, and this has been made a life study by Nicholas Power, of the Nicholas Power Co., with the result that the right to adopt the slogan, "Power's Perfect Projection" has been conceded.

Because of this, the Cameragraph manufactured by the Nicholas Power Company of New York has attained a degree of popularity so great that the best sources of information indicate that this company is now selling a large part of all the projection machines used on the western hemisphere. The popularity of the Cameragraph has resulted almost wholly from its superiority in workmanship, design, material and projecting qualities.

KLEINE BUILDS STUDIO IN ITALY

Cable advices from George Kleine tell of the building of a magnificent and costly studio in July which will be used to produce important Kleine attractions Mr. Kleine cables:

"You are now at liberty to announce formation of Photo Drama Production Company of Italy. Have bought beautiful estate permitting staging of fifty scenes simultaneously in natural and artificial settings. Policy is to combine artistic perfection of Italian with virility of American methods, taking the best from both schools. Big features only. Have engaged well-known American artists not previously in pictures."

on a suit of clothes that fell to pieces in thirty days, I'll bet you would have something to say about the cloth he used in the next one he made for you. If the many exchanges and feature buyers of this country took as much interest in the wearing quality of their films as they do in their clothes, they would insist on having all their films printed on Lumiere stock.

Music and the Picture

Suggestions Invited, Questions Cheerfully Answered

Address: Music Department, The Motion Picture News

SOME years ago, when motion pictures were still considered as a novelty only, Dewey's on Fourteenth street, New York, ran a few reels a day together with cheap small-time vaudeville. There was practically no attempt made to follow the pictures by the pianist and his one assistant, the drummer. But the whole house was kept continuously convulsed in mirth by the latter, who had a clever fashion of passing witty remarks, supposedly in a stage whisper, but really so they might be heard all over the house. I have never been able to learn whether this was done with the consent of the management or whether the drummer did it on his own responsibility. At any rate it was a most successful experiment.

His remarks were confined to the comedies mostly, and were quite as humorous as the pictures. But once in a while he would make a noise as of two persons kissing each other at a critical time, and thus would invariably bring down the house. While this can hardly be recommended to-day, as a means of amusing an audience, dramas have reached their present state of perfection, but with the comedies the drummer can still be of great assistance. A word here or there mimicking the comedians will often help "get over" some humorous flash which the average person would otherwise lose.

THE present drummer at Loew's Broadway Theatre in New York City has the right idea. His outfit is very complete, and he seems to have the knack of getting in just the right sound at just the right time. The whole orchestra at this theatre, it seems to me, is as nearly in harmony with the productions shown as it is possible to be.

Several nights ago I was in this theatre when "The Yellow Slave," a three-part Melies drama, entirely enacted by Japanese was being shown. Throughout this film the orchestra played selections from "The Mikado," which naturally fitted in exceedingly well with the scenes on the screen, and at the same time pleased every one. People everywhere were humming the tune long after they had ceased to play it.

Our English contemporary, The Bioscope, in a recent issue suggests the advisability of having "request music." This subject has been much talked of in this country for several years, and a few theatres have taken it up. It is asserted that the houses in England, which have been playing the music requested by the audiences, have met with signal success.

On the other hand, it is said that the main objection to this is the difficulty of being able to follow the picture, if the orchestra is playing request music. That this objection is sound seems probable. It may be that our English cousins find that "request music" is a drawing card, but it is doubtful if this would ever work on this side of the Herring Pond.

THERE would be a small coterie of real music lovers, who would attend the pictures merely in order to hear a concert, but they would not come at all for the pictures in comparison with the music.

Their primary reason for attending at all would be the orchestration, and they would look at the screen simply because they would be unable to keep their eyes away from it.

But would the real picture lovers or "fans" stay?

It is, indeed, a big question. Personally I believe they would be very apt to go, when they could hear just as good music that was more in harmony with the pictures.

I shall be most pleased to hear the views of musicians on this important topic or on any other in this department. Letters will be given full publicity if available. A. D. M.

A PORTABLE ELECTRIC FOUNTAIN

A very beautiful as well as unusual decoration for motion picture theatres is the portable electric fountain manufactured and marketed by the Electric Fountain Company at 348 West Forty-second street, New York City. Not only does this fountain give unique and charming effects with its spray, which is changing color constantly, giving many novel effects, but it has a great advantage in that it may be installed in any theatre.

The portable electric fountain fills a want that has long been felt by the exhibitors who wish to make their theatre artistic and attractive, but who have felt they could not afford the luxury of having a fountain installed. Where the theatre has been built without due allowance for the ordinary fountain, installing a fountain necessitates tearing up the floor and other alterations which are both expensive and inconvenient, and making the change is apt to interfere with business.

The electric fountain manufactured by the Electric Fountain Company does away with all this, for it needs no water supply, drain or discharge pipe, because the same water is used over and over again by having a motor and pump concealed in the base. In fact, two quarts of water is all that is necessary to give a graceful spray.

The colored illustration on page 35 in this issue gives an idea of one of the many fountains manufactured by this company. This may be used as a center decoration if placed in the lobby or reception room or two may be used on the stage, one on each side of the screen. With a few ferns or plants around each fountain they make a very pleasing decoration.

In itself the fountain is a thing of beauty. The combination of electric light and falling water is very effective. Gold-fish in the water add to the effect. The water in the fountains may be perfumed or any mild antiseptic added.

The Electric Fountain Company makes many different styles of fountains, including large ones made to order to harmonize with any given scheme of decoration. They can be built of any material or size required.

The fountains are now being used in many motion picture theatres all over the country. A few of the users are: New York Theatre, New York City; American Music Hall, New York City; Strand Theatre, Buffalo; Colonial Theatre, Chicago, and Poli's, New Haven. Among the motion picture concerns using the fountain in their projection rooms are the Biograph and the Universal Film Manufacturing Company.

Many exhibitors, after once seeing the electric fountain in operation and having the simplicity of its operation explained to them, have placed orders at once for their theatres.

SPECIAL FILM REVIEWS

"BEN BOLT." (Solax. Four reels.)—The story of this thrilling production, while taking its name from the song made famous by Du Maurier in "Trilby," presents so many elements of dramatic interest not to be found in the original verses as to make it entirely new. It is staged with a realism which is unusual even for a film of the grade commonly produced by the Solax Company. Photographically it is good, and the progress of its action never flags from beginning to end.

Among the most striking scenes is the wreck of the Ben Bolt, a schooner which takes its name from the hero of the piece. The crew, together with the band of cutthroats who have seized the schooner, are rescued in realistic fashion by the lifeguards. An especially dramatic part of the story is shown when Ben Bolt is bound to the wheel of an old mill by some of the pirate crew. As a thriller, this section of the film could hardly be excelled, although there are many other moments hardly less exciting as the piece progresses.

Ben Bolt is rescued just in the nick of time by Rolling Stone, the comedian of the production, and is enabled to outwit and confuse his enemies in the end, as all good heroes should do. Joseph Levering, the Solax Company's leading man, takes the part of Ben Bolt; Fraunie Fraunholz is Rolling Stone, and Miss Claire Whitney is Alice. Others in the cast worthy of mention are James O'Neill and Jack Burns.

Much credit is due Howell Hansel, under whose direction "Ben Bolt" was produced.

"When Ursus Threw the Bull." (Nestor. Two reels.)—One of the cleverest burlesque-comedies ever produced. The small town circus is "hit off" in great style. Al. E. Christie is to be congratulated. As the "bull" and his master strike, together with all the stage hands, it is necessary to recruit more. Local firemen and a stuffed animal do very well until an alarm is rung.

"The Mystery of Sydney Street." (Warner's Features. Three reels.)—Made by the Milano Company in Italy. A very good story of mystery and romance. The suspicion of a murder falls on the shoulders of a debtor and he is closely watched. The evidence becomes tangled by the introduction of another apparent murder. The true villain is caught at last, when he has gained the consent of the widow to marry her.

"The Yellow Slave." (Melies Three parts. Dec. 11.)—General Film Co. Exclusive Service)—One of the first productions by any company in which the characters are played by an entirely Japanese company. For this reason, if for no other, the drama is one of great interest, The Japanese style of acting is a peculiar combination between European, principally the French, and a style all their own. The faces of the actors are absolutely immovable. The story is of the Russian period, and tells of a young recruit parting with his sweetheart and going to the front. She, hearing that he is dead, and greatly needing the money, becomes a slave girl in a tea house. The lover returns later and, after much work, succeeds in freeing her. A very effective ending shows the two committing suicide, slowly walking together out into the water.

"The Heart of the Law." (Essanay. Dec. 9.)—Not worthy of the Essanay Company. A very tame detective story, similar to many that have gone before. Richard Travers and Ruth Stonehouse play the leads.

"The Stolen Plans." (Edison. Dec. 9.)—A story of the English army by Goring Cholsey, introducing aeroplanes. Marc McDermott and Miriam Nesbitt do some very good work. The atmosphere is especially good.

"The Harp of Tara." (Domino. Two reels.)—A pretty Irish romance, founded on the well-known poem. Rory, a young man studying for the ministry, loves Nora. The old priest has a dream in which he sees the soldiers demanding the taxes on pain of eviction. Rory finds the mythical harp and thus Ireland is freed. Then he awakes. The finish is somewhat enigmatical. Matches were not known in the time of the Georges.

"The Hour and the Man." Essanay—Mr. Roach, of the Essanay scenario staff, has written another splendid play. It is psychological. It is strong and it brings forth a big lesson. The theme of the photoplay is in these few lines which he dashed off, and from which rose the inspiration:

"We sin, and judge others. We transgress, and appoint authorities to punish transgression. We obey a distorted impulse, commit that which it recommends and contemplate the act with remorse. We ask Him to forgive our sins, and do not heed the prayers of other sinners. We make laws forbidding men to murder, and we murder those who disobey the law. The whole thing is just a little silly, isn't it? But over the frail structure of man's justice is the invisible and invincible Guiding Hand."

The situations are very good from the outset, and as the story ripens they grow stronger. Mr. Calvert in the producing of this photoplay made his selections with care. His scenic effects are of the right kind. His situations are introduced at the right moment. He built a splendid film around a splendid scenario. Francis X. Bushman as the young lawyer plays the role convincingly. William Bailey, Ruth Stonehouse and Clara Smith are well cast.

Two brothers, both young lawyers, love the same girl. Frank Maxwell is sincere in his affections, while his brother William is wooing the girl under an assumed name. She encourages the latter and is married to him. He does not change his habits, and his drunkenness brings his family to the poorest part of the city to live. The wife pleads with him for the sake of the child to cease in his ways, but he pays no attention to her. An old neighbor one day drops in to see the young mother and she offers her a cup of coffee. In pouring it out she accidentally spills some on the old lady's hand, burning her severely. She secures a bottle of medicine which is very poisonous and applies it, leaving the bottle on the table. The husband arrives home, pours himself a cup of coffee and knocks over the bottle. The fluid flows over the table top, and into his cup as he holds it, while he talks to his wife. The poison takes immediate effect and he dies a short time after. The wife is accused of murder.

The judges appoint a lawyer to defend her. This lawyer proves to be the not aware that he is defending his dead man's brother. He, however, is brother's wife as he married under an assumed name. He is victorious in his suit. While summing up he opens his watch and the mother gets a glance at a picture he has in it of his brother. When she comes out of the swoon she tells Frank that her husband was his brother. His first intention is to cast her off, but the tiny babe's cooing causes him to take both of them into his household. C. J. V.

"The Blue Rose." (Vitagraph. Two reels. Dec. 12. General Film Company Exclusive Service.)—The chief beauty of this picture is its claim to some originality. It has this at least, and is, in addition, thoroughly pleasing in every respect. There is not the faintest suggestion of anything at all disagreeable. Van Dyke Brooke directed the picture, as well as taking an important part.

An old florist, having discovered a method of producing a blue rose, is greatly elated until it is stolen by a rival. His daughter, obtaining work at the competitor's, discovers the rose to be the same, but unfortunately falls in love with the son of her father's rival, who confesses that he is the thief, not knowing that she is the daughter of the man he had robbed. Eventually everything turns out for the best. Van Dyke Brooke has certainly learned the secret of portraying pathos. Miss Talmadge looked her prettiest. A. D. M.

THE CLERK READS THE VERDICT—A SCENE IN "THE HOUR AND THE MAN"

"Peg o' the Movies." (Edison. Two reels. Dec. 12.)—From James Oppenheim's story in The Ladies' World. There are parts that are very conventional, and others that are the reverse. All told, it makes a very suitable offering. Gertrude McCoy as Peg excels herself. She is very nearly perfect.

Peg, a country girl, refuses to marry Stephen, although she loves him, and joins the film army. Stephen goes to the West and sees Peg on the screen in the arms of the leading man. They are finally brought together again, and Stephen learns that Peg never really loved the handsome leading man. Benjamin Wilson and Bigelow Cooper ably assist Peg.

"Jack and the Beanstalk." (Thanhouser. 1,500 feet.)—Not a complete two-reel, the balance being filled in with a short comedy. This splendid story is enacted by children, with the exception of three characters, and is superior in every respect. The Thanhouser "Kid" and "Kidlet" play the leads. A larger giant would have improved the deception for the children.

"Michael Arnold and Doctor Lynn." (Gem. Two reels.)—Beginning with a freshness that is pleasing, it is allowed at the finish to become conventional. A doctor, loving another's wife, throws the blame of an apparent murder on him, and sends him to prison. The doctor later confesses to the man on his escape from prison.

"One of the Bravest." (Rex. Two reels.)—Poor photography and several inconsistencies rather spoil what might have been an excellent picture. Members of fire departments do not ride around in taxi-cabs for amusement. An excellent fire scene is staged.

"The Stolen Legacy." (Cines. Two reels. Dec. 9.)—The story is quite conventional, but clever acting, good costumes and settings "get it over" in good shape. The father of a child dies and leaves a fortune in trust for her to a friend who proves false. Many years later they meet again, she as a gypsy and he as a wealthy and respected citizen.

"At Phnom Penh, Cambodia." (Melies. Dec. 11. Split reel.)—The photography is very poor, and depicts the silver temples and statues. It ends with a number of dancers and soldiers. Not very interesting.

"Beautiful Ankor-Wat, Cambodia." (Melies. Split reel. Dec. 11.)—Shows a number of ruins of buildings and statuary. Poor photography takes away much of the interest.

INTERESTING FILM REVIEWS

Educational—Industrial—Scenic—General

"CUPID Makes a Bull's-eye."—(Selig. Dec. 8. General Film Company Exclusive Service.)—In this case Cupid does it in a novel way. The father of the boy and the mother of the girl object to their respective children marrying each other. So the children make them marry each other.

"The Strike." (Kalem. Dec. 8.)—As the name implies, the action deals with differences of opinion between a mine owner and his employees. The former admits he is wrong and the trouble is over.

"The Manicure Girl." (Edison. Dec. 8.)—A neat little comedy written by George Randolph Chester. Jack is madly in love but is opposed by the girl's mother. The manicure girl manages to disgust the mother with her favorite, and Jack wins out.

"The Capturing of David Dunne." (Biograph. Dec. 8.)—The scene is the country and the theme a fight for the only available unmarried man. The barn dance scene is very good. The girl finally wins the prize by proving herself to be a good cook.

"Alexia's Strategy." (Edison. Two parts. Dec. 5.)—How a clever girl finds the guilty thief and liberates from prison her innocent lover. Mary Fuller, Charles Ogle, Harry Beaumont, Bigelow Cooper and Frank McGlynn form the cast. Having discovered a theft, a Russian levies blackmail. Alexia finally gets the foreigner to confess that the man in prison is innocent.

"Life, Love and Liberty." (Lubin. Dec. 12.)—Taken by the Mexico company. Velma Whitman, Henry Stanley and Raymond Gallagher play the leads. Makes a very good offering. Plenty of action. A warrant for arrest is written in ink on an old sheet of paper. This is the only careless part.

"The Life Saver." (Vitagraph. Dec. 12.)—A good comedy of the seashore variety. Wallie Van, Lillian Walker and A. H. Ashley are the principals. Ethel wins Cutey, or perhaps it is Cutey who wins Ethel. At any rate, it is a good story.

"Birds of the Inland Marsh." (Patheplay split reel. Dec. 12.)—An interesting treatise on birds. Somewhat similar to scenes from "How Wild Animals Live." The tern, sea swallow, black tern, ibis, grebes, etc., are all shown.

"Journey to the Environs of Naples." (Patheplay. Dec. 12.)—Same reel with "Birds of the Inland Marsh." The photography is fair, the film being tinted with color. There are many pretty views.

"General Bunko's Victory." (Kalem. Split reel. Dec. 12.)—An impossible comedy done in the Kalem style that "gets it over." It may have been that John Brennan was Col. Bunko, but his make-up was impossible to penetrate.

"Piano Manufacturing." (Kalem. Split reel. Dec. 12.—Same reel with "Col. Bunko's Victory." An interesting exposition on how pianos are made. Should be well received.

"A Modern Portia." (Patheplay. Two reels. Dec. 11.)—Woman lawyers are rarities in the pictures. This story is from the Paris Pathe company, and tells of a woman lawyer who becomes engaged to the doctor of one of her clients. Later, having drawn up the will of the woman, she is called on to settle the estate. She discovers that the doctor has stolen all the money. She represents the plaintiff, against her lover, who is sent to prison. There are many good situations.

"A Foul and Fearful Plot." (Biograph. Dec. 11. Split Reel.)—Same reel with "The Troublesome Mole." A humorous burlesque on the modern "Western" picture. Should be well received.

"Sacrifice." (Vitagraph. Dec. 11.)—A love story in which a girl gives up her lover to another whom he loves more. The action takes place first in Honolulu, later switching to California. Anne Schaefer, Myrtle Gonzales and George A. Holt were the principal characters.

"The Funny Regiment." (Union Features. Dec. 30. Three reels.)—The first multiple reel comedy by the Paris Eclair. Founded on the novel by Georges Courteline, it is most amusing. Except for two scenes which are slightly vulgar, the story is of the best kind. A regiment recruits two practical jokers and a dude, and the combination starts all sorts of trouble. A kind-hearted general helps them in their difficulties.

UNIVERSAL'S BARBECUE

Twenty-five hundred persons gathered at Universal City, California, recently and made merry as the guests of the Universal Film Manufacturing Company on the occasion of the company's annual barbecue. Of this number more than 600 were employees of the company, and the remaining 1,900 were their friends and families. It was the biggest gathering of the motion picture people which has taken place in California. The entire transportation department of the Western branch of the Universal was commissioned to transfer the crowds from the Hollywood studios to Universal City.

The barbecuing of a 2,100 pound steer was in charg. of Joseph Flores, leader of the Universal band of cowboys. It was a strictly democratic gathering. Lois Weber, Phillips Smalley, J. Warren Kerrigan, and many other Universal stars took their places in the bread-line with the extra people and waited their turn to be served.

The principal amusement of the day was furnished by members of Director Allan Curtis' "Joker" company, nearly all of whom have been successful performers in vaudeville. There was a baseball game between the boys of the Universal City and the "Joker" boys, and the comedians were defeated by a score of 17 to 3.

Max Asher, the star comedian of the "Joker" brand, gave an impersonation of "Herman the Greater" to the piano accompaniment of Harry McCoy. Jack Pierce and Bill Franey, two of the "Joker" policemen, who understand how to fall off three-story buildings without serious damage, were the principals in a boxing bout

AMERICAN FILM'S FIRST THREE-REEL

The first three-reel subject put out by the American Film Manufacturing Company has been set for release Monday, January 12, 1914. The title is "Destinies Fulfilled" and the production is a subject which is full of human interest. It involves three generations and is told in a charming manner, with great care and precision.

Sydney Ayres plays the lead with Vivian Rich playing opposite, in the first two reels. In the last reel Harry Von Meter is the lover and Vivian Rich "doubles" as her own daughter.

First Review of "Antony and Cleopatra"

Ptolemies. The days speed by amid the caresses of Cleopatra and the ephemeral triumphs of royalty.

One year later, in Rome, Octavia, grieving for the absence of her husband, Mark Antony, tells her brother Octavius that her domestic affairs are reaching a crisis. Octavius, who bears but little love for Antony, comforts her as best he can, suggesting that she go to Egypt and reconquer Mark Antony for herself and for Rome. Accordingly Antony, who spends his days in idleness and luxury, is startled by the arrival of Octavia with a retinue of women. He refuses, however, to give up his present life, and advises her to betake herself immediately back to Rome. Before leaving Octavia calls upon Cleopatra and tries in vain to persuade her to send Antony home. This suggestion meets with nothing but scorn and contempt, and Octavia, with a parting curse, returns again to the Eternal City.

Octavia, having returned to Rome, narrates to some Senators how Mark Antony has abandoned her, saying, "Her arms are the fatal coils of the serpent which encircle Antony." The Senate is summoned to sit in judgment upon him, and, as the result of many inflammable speeches, the declaration is made that Antony is no longer a citizen of Rome, and that an emissary be sent so to inform him. This messenger delivers the decree of the Senate in a rough manner, and Antony replies, "Get thee back to Rome, and tell that child who calls himself Octavius that I laugh at him and all Rome, and that thou hath insulted me and I troubled not to kill thee!"

Upon receipt of this the Roman Senate promptly declares war upon Egypt, and Octavius, who had fostered the hatred of Rome, as well as of the family, assumed command of the Roman army. A great flotilla of galleys, loaded with soldiers, sets forth from Ostia for Alexandria.

OCTAVIUS lands his army on Egyptian soil and begins a long overland march to Alexandria. In the Palace of the Ptolemies Antony daily sits upon the throne of the ancient Pharaohs and spends the nights in sensual orgies. Although dimly aware of the approaching danger Antony is indifferent. Nearer and ever nearer draws the Roman vanguard, while Antony's doom speeds on the wings of fate.

With captured prisoners, the army of Octavius sweeps on to the gates of Alexandria. Toward the wall, toward the gates, toward the royal palace of the Ptolemies, rushes the mighty army.

In one of the great rooms of the palace a majestic fête is in progress. Cleopatra, cymbals in hand, dances to the delight of Antony and the courtiers. Suddenly a disheveled, terror-maddened Egyptian dashes frantically in with the cry, "The Romans! The Romans!"

Pandemonium reigns, soldiers run hither and thither. In a moment the great room is the scene of a panic-stricken multitude who flee to the defense of Alexandria.

An accurate portrayal of the memorable battle follows. Antony fights nobly but despairingly. The troops of Octavius tear down the great walls, amid a hail of rocks from above. They drive back a horde of desperately fighting Egyptians from their boats. The city becomes a great blaze of flame, and the troops of Octavius finally cut their way through the thickly-massed Egyptians on the steps of the royal palace and make their entrance into the sacred precincts of the throne.

Then Antony, realizing that all is lost, rushes into an apartment, accompanied only by a faithful henchman. Turning roughly upon his servant, Antony cries: "Come, fool, draw thy sword and slay me, and thou shalt be the most-talked-of man in Rome."

But the servant, drawing his sword, replies: "Nay, master, that I cannot do! See! Let thy faithful servant show thee how to die!" Saying which, he buries his sword in his heart.

In another instant Antony seizes the sword and thrusts it into his own breast. As he dies Cleopatra, running in from an adjoining room, throws herself upon his body and weeps.

OCTAVIUS, the victor, orders solemn obsequies in honor of Antony, while the fertile mind of Cleopatra turns quickly to a means of safety for herself.

"Either shall I have the power to win this man to-night or the star of Alexander the Great shall set with me forever," she mutters. Accordingly, when Octavius waits upon her, she tries the old wiles that succeeded so well with Antony.

But the stony heart of Cæsar knows no relenting. He shakes off her caresses and bids her prepare to accompany him to Rome as a slave. He leaves her, and Cleopatra, falling back upon a divan, sees a vision of the royal entry of Octavius into Rome, with her in chains, bound to the wheels of his chariot. She sees the great temples and buildings of the Eternal City alive with tens of thousands of hooting, jeering Romans, who yell their imprecations at her as she passes.

The Egyptian queen leaps to her feet, the vision fades, and the terror-stricken woman goes to a soothsayer, who had previously been seen in the views of the palace, in search of death. The witch gives her different poisons. Cleopatra holds court for the last time. A slave is pushed forward, takes the poison and dies in frightful agony. A second slave stiffens with keen torture and drops dead at her feet.

Cleopatra shudders and calls for the asp. The fangs of the serpent sink into the arm of a third slave, and he dies so calmly that Cleopatra is constrained to ask, "Slave! is death coming?"

In another room, ten minutes later, Cleopatra takes the asp from a basket of fruit and applies it to her bosom.

"The end is at hand and death draws near. My pyramid will be the greatness of my death! Antony—soon shall I join thee!" she murmurs and dies.

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality — that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.

INDIA, home of dark men of dark deeds, always had fascination for us. We used to read every Oriental story we could lay hands on. Now we look at every Oriental photoplay we hear about.

The Treasure of Buddha is redolent of the mystic atmosphere of the ancient East, heavy with the fragrance of Hindoo temples where stolid eyed idols look down upon mystic priests and altars stained with sacrificial blood. Love heroic and adventure unusual run neck and neck throughout the three reels.

As a feature film we're proud of it.

CLERGY ASKED TO WRITE SCENARIOS

With the idea of obtaining a fresh supply of scenarios written from a different viewpoint of life than that of the ordinary writer, the Lubin Manufacturing Company has sent out a communication to the clergy of America asking them to contribute subjects suitable for motion picture production. Stress is laid on the importance of the film as a means of carrying a message to millions of people, when by any other method it is difficult, if not impossible, even to reach thousands.

It is the desire of the Lubin Company that its film stories, aside from the quality of mere dramatic entertainment, should embody some fundamental truth, and it is with this object that the co-operation of the clergy and their suggestions and criticisms is being sought. Probably every clergyman can recall from his own experience some story of genuine dramatic value, which will convey in its development a lesson of spiritual, moral, social or hygienic worth, of such a nature that its appeal will be practically universal. It is hoped that many stories of this character will be brought out by this novel departure of the Lubin Company in its quest for superior subjects for film production.

NEWMAN OPENS CHICAGO OFFICES

The Newman Manufacturing Company, with main offices and factory at Cincinnati, Ohio, and with branch factory and display rooms at 101 Fourth avenue, New York City, has found it impossible to handle satisfactorily all of its business at these two places, and in consequence is to establish branch factory and display rooms in Chicago to meet the demands of the Western trade.

This firm manufactures brass poster frames, brass easels, brass railings, brass grilles, brass signs, and special brass work of every description for theatres throughout the country, and their new, large and complete catalog will be forwarded to any theatre-owner upon request. It will contain many new and novel ideas

T. J. EVANS HEADS NEW COMPANY

T. J. Evans, formerly and for several years associated with P. A. Powers, latterly as the manager of the Powers Photoplay Studio in Los Angeles, Cal., is now the head of a concern recently organized to print and develop films for the trade and to make special motion pictures. The new company, which is called the Evans Film Manufacturing Company, with offices and laboratories at 416 West 216th street, New York City, has just opened for business.

The laboratory is fully equipped with the latest machines, including those of the Bell & Howell Co., A. W. Haussmann and the Corcoran Company, and is prepared to handle the product of producing concerns that have no laboratories of their own.

While Mr. Evans is a young man, he is regarded as one of the old timers in the motion picture field, having been identified with the development of the film for more than ten years. His organization is composed of men who have worked together in the laboratory end of motion picture production for several years past.

The new plant, which is now open for inspection, contains projection machines, negative assemblers and a private room for clients of the company. It is the boast of Mr. Evans that every foot of film is inspected before it leaves the laboratory and that from the time it is taken from the washing tanks, until it is delivered to the customer it does not once touch the bare hands of a single employee.

Many innovations have been inaugurated by the new company. The laboratory is finished in white enamel and each employee wears white gloves and is garbed in immaculate white. Every room is supplied with filtered air. All this has been done with the object of securing further cleanliness, which is one of the prime factors in the manufacture of film.

"MIROR VITÆ" PRODUCTS

Motion picture operators everywhere are interested in the new model "Miror Vitae" cinematograph which has lately been placed on the market by Eberhard Schneider, head of the German-American Cinematograph and Film Company, 219 Second avenue, New York City. The numerous "Miror Vitae" products, which include the "Mirovitaphone," different types of projecting machines and a host of accessories essential to the conduct of the motion picture business, are all of the best grade, a fact which is recognized by exhibitors and operators all over the world.

All the "Miror Vitae" products are on constant exhibition at the offices of the company, 219 Second avenue, New York City.

"Showing" vs. "Getting" Advertisers

THE publisher of a trade journal was talking with a prospective advertiser one day, when one of the advertising solicitors came in.

"Well," announced the latter jubilantly, "I got three more to-day," meaning "three more" advertisers.

BOTH publisher and prospective advertiser winced; neither particularly cared to hear the advertiser alluded to as "got," a victim, as it were, cajoled, captured and tied.

When the advertiser left the publisher's office the latter held a further conversation with his solicitor.

"TAKE the word 'getting' out of your advertising vocabulary," he advised. "It has no place there.

"It leads one to believe that you don't quite understand what advertising really means.

"Let us see:

"WE are making here and marketing a certain product called a magazine. We are manufacturers, just like the manufacturers you say you 'got' to-day.

"In order to succeed we must make a good magazine. Otherwise we won't sell it.

"THIS then is our main problem—making and selling a magazine. The advertising we carry is purely an incidental, a secondary matter. It is a later problem.

* * *

"GOOD magazines were made and sold before advertising was invented. Even within fairly recent years newspapers—the London Times, for instance—were made and sold with scarcely a line of advertising.

* * *

"BUT advertising has become a tremendous commercial factor—and therefore a great publishing factor. Because of this we publishers of this day are enabled to make better magazines and sell them for much less than they were sold a generation ago.

"But that doesn't interest the advertiser.

"HIS position is simply this:

"He finds that we are producing a good publication. It goes regularly to a certain number of possible purchasers of his goods.

"He discovers that through its pages he can reach these purchasers more cheaply than individually under a two-cent stamp—still more cheaply than if he published his own magazine.

* * *

"AND he further knows that his announcement is dignified by its appearance in a good magazine and that the reader who has paid good money to receive this good magazine is very apt to prove a good customer for his goods.

"That is all he cares about.

"SO all you need do is to 'show' him this opportunity—this publication, its circulation, its gain, its kind of circulation, its territorial distribution.

"You 'show' him; you don't 'get' him.

"IF you 'get' him without 'showing' him, he won't appreciate the value of your publication and how best to use it. If you don't dare 'show' him, it won't avail you, and it will hurt you to 'get' him, for then you won't hold him.

* * *

"'GETTING' advertisers mean persuading them to advertise through personality, cajolery, appeals to 'help us out.' It is false and fruitless to all concerned. It is waste for the advertiser and eventual ruin for the publication, for in the latter instance it is building on the sands. It is writing advertising ahead of circulation, which is the cart before the horse.

* * *

"'SHOWING' advertisers means giving them an opportunity and us the support we are honestly entitled to in getting out a constantly better product."

INTERNATIONAL DELEGATES MEET

Propose Consolidation of Two Exhibitors' Organizations if M. A. Neff Will Retire—Demand Mileage for Last July's National Convention—Chicago Gathering Harmonious, Enthusiastic and Well Attended

DELEGATES of the International Motion Picture Association met in Chicago at the LaSalle Hotel on December 18 and 19, convened harmoniously and discussed intelligently and at length several subjects of vital importance to the industry at large, and especially to the exhibitors of the country. It was felt by those who attended that the gathering was a great success from every standpoint. There were no recognizable differences in the body, and suggestions and recommandations which were put before the body received the consideration of the entire body, were threshed out, and the most satisfactory conclusion arrived at to the satisfaction of all present.

A spirit of optimism pervaded the entire gathering which bespoke a degree of success that has not been credited this organization. From the discussions carried on it was gathered that the action of this body was endorsed by all its members of the different States and locals, and that it was thoroughly agreed that its standing to-day was greater than might really be expected.

Committee to Make Peace Overtures

Feeling that the organized efforts of the exhibition end of the motion picture business is vitally necessary to that branch of the business, and believing that the larger this organization is the easier it would be to conduct matters that require the attention of the exhibitors of the country, it was decided to appoint a committee whose purpose it is to find ways and means to consolidate all the exhibitors of the United States into one concrete body, working towards a single goal and along harmonious lines to be governed by its entire membership.

In this connection the following motion was adopted:

"That a committee be appointed to devise ways and means of consolidating all exhibitors of the country into one national organization, and this committee to report back to the board of directors."

This committee which consists of Samuel Trigger, of New York City, chairman; William Sweeney, of Chicago; Thomas Furniss, of Duluth, Minn.; George Fischer, of Milwaukee, and Fred Herrington, of Pittsburgh, was instructed to communicate with the board of directors of the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America to determine whether that body would co-operate with them in attaining this end. It is not the purpose of this committee to present plans where one organization would absorb the other, but to effect a consolidation. This committee was instructed that under no circumstances would a consolidation be considered if Mr. Neff continues as president.

As stated by the maker of the motion, the reason of this move is that it is realized by both factions that two bodies working for the same end and along the same lines to accomplish the identical purpose cannot possibly accomplish the same results as could the combined efforts of the two factions working as one with the combined strength of all. It was further claimed that their reason for taking this stand was to demonstrate their broadmindedness on the question.

Claim Possible Membership of 7,100

Although this proposition of amalgamation was to be put up to the Motion Picture Exhibitors' League of America it was felt that M. A. Neff, president of that organization, would not resign. Their purpose in presenting this idea of consolidation was to demonstrate their desire to band together.

Along this line of amalgamation this body heartily endorsed the letter recently mailed by Mr. Trigger to all the trade publications.

A motion was made that the alleged failure of M. A. Neff to pay the mileage to the national vice-presidents be referred to Mr. Rogers, their attorney, for action.

This motion refers to the money expended for railroad fare by the vice-presidents on their trip to and from New York City for the convention which was held last July. Samuel H. Trigger stated that he turned over to Mr. Neff $2,000 for this purpose some time after the convention.

The International Motion Picture Association claim that they have a possible membership of 7,100 exhibitors. They base these figures on the claim that New York state has 2,000 exhibitors; Illinois, 1,200; Pennsylvania, 1,500; Minnesota, 400; Wisconsin, 400; Indiana, 400; and Massachusetts, 1,200.

It was announced at this meeting that the International Motion Picture Association had been chartered under the state of New York with the privilege to establish state branches.

The matter of changing their by-laws so that each local could have representatives at national conventions was put over until their next meeting which will be held in Cleveland on March 3rd. It is thought that it will be revised so that a delegate will be allowed for every twenty-five members or majority thereof.

Dutch Luncheon a Great Success

The Dutch luncheon which was given in the banquet hall on the nineteenth floor of the LaSalle Hotel was a tremendous success. It was the biggest thing yet attempted by the exhibitors of Chicago. Half past ten in the evening was the time set to start the merriment. Before an hour had passed however, it was found necessary to squeeze in many extra tables, and also to set tables in the corridors.

Mr. Choynsky acted as toastmaster and introduced Mr. Phillips, the president of the association, as the first speaker. His talk was interesting and to the point. He closed his remarks by inviting all exhibitors present and exhibitors of the whole world to attend the exhibition and ball which will be given in Milwaukee on January 24, 1914.

Samuel H. Trigger, of New York City, was the next speaker. Mrs. Trigger's telegram which he read was a source of amusement, as she stated that if he did not come home she would come to Chicago. He stated that he would try to reciprocate the hospitality shown and assured them that the next time that gathering came to New York he would tender them a Dutch luncheon, German supper and Hebrew breakfast.

He was followed by John Rock, of Vitagraph. Hal Johnstone, secretary of the Operators' Union, spoke at length on the advisability of combining their organization and the association in a separate organization for the purpose of protecting themselves on any legislation that might come up injurious to either body as their interests were identical. F. J. Rembush, the mirror screen man of Indianapolis, spoke next. He was followed by Fred Herrington, of Pittsburgh, who spoke on censorship. Abe Balaban and Mr. Whelan entertained with illustrated songs. Ike Van Runkel, of the General Film Company, made a few remarks as did William Hershberg, of the General Feature Film Company. Mr. Sweeney made the closing speech, and of course, complimented the ladies.

Those present from Milwaukee were: J. H. Sillman, B. K. Fischer, S. Trinz, J. W. Tufts, J. B. Olinger, Sam R. Pylet and Jos. Cochrane and Mr. C. H. Phillips.

Also present were Fred Herrington and Henry Poke, of Pittsburgh; J. F. Miller, of Buffalo; Sam Trigger, of New York; F. J. Rembush, of Indianapolis; Mr. Furniss, of Duluth, Minn.; Harold W. Rosenthal, of New York, and Mr. Doque, of Utica.

HOW AN EXHIBITOR MADE GOOD

The Dramatic Story of a Big Success from a Small Beginning

A CONSIDERABLE imagination seems almost essential to place credence in the claim that the exhibitor with a theatre representing a $10,000 investment has the same opportunities for success, on a smaller basis, as the exhibitor operating a house which cost $1,500,000 to construct.

Or is it imagination that is required?

Those, who know, make the somewhat commonplace and time-worn remark that it is just plain common sense and hard work that are needed as the base work of the bridge that will span this gap.

And to prove the absolute fidelity of their assertions an illustration has been cited. The illustration is Samuel R. Rothapfel. This is not to be an autobiography, nor a gilt-edged history of the man, but of his experiences. Mr. Rothapfel has been termed the "Belasco of the pictures," a forerunner of the exhibitors of the twenty-first century, and so many other things that he was incited to jot them down. And then, characteristic of his temperament, he threw the notes away.

The one, great, big, glaring fact that is most prominent in his career is that Mr. Rothapfel spanned the gap between a theatre—his first—that had served, before its conversion to a place of amusement, as a store-room for the extra equipment of a barroom and dance hall, and a theatre which today is looked upon as the acme of perfection among the homes of pictures. And this is the story of how he did it.

IT was an old, tumble-down and dirty looking dance hall, that presented itself as the only possible outlet for his desire to become an exhibitor. That was six years ago in a little city that nestles close under the shadows of the Ridge, a tall, gray-coated mountain, deep in the center of the Pennsylvania coal regions. "The dance hall," a title that remained as its last claim to civilization, and conferred upon it by a few whose memory of earlier days had clung as a solace, had long been crammed with kegs, chairs minus legs and arms, glass smashed to bits through slipping from uncertain fingers in the adjoining room, musty carpets and matting, and an odor. This last was not exactly an odor. It was a plague, communicated to every board and remnant of shoddy furnishings housed in the room. It suggested a blended mixture of liquor-soaked carpets, moss, frowsy wallpaper and moisture-rotted wood.

Into this uninviting place walked a resolute man who wanted to become an exhibitor. His entrance was not through the barroom, for he wanted to make the inspection unnoticed, but down a long, dark alley, its passage almost obstructed by kegs and refuse of many kinds. Later the alley became the only available lobby for the theatre.

So it came about that two weeks later, two theatre owners in this same little mining city aroused a feeling of perfectly respectable sympathy within themselves for the fate of one, who was soon to become a competitor. Their houses were admirably located, right in the heart of the business district, with people compelled to pass and repass their doors. Surely, that little malodorous rear-room two blocks away, where all was dark, and where none but a few foreigners ever went, would make a sorry showing with motion pictures.

* * * *

BUT the rebuffs, the jeers, the friendly advice, so-called, to forget his aspirations, and constant discouragements from every side, all fell short of their purpose with this man, who wanted to become an exhibitor. It was the best he could get, and he took it without question, although not without thought.

A week later the back room of the dance hall and saloon was formally opened as a bona fide motion picture theatre. The floors had been relaid, the walls covered with an inexpensive, but durable and attractive matting, comfortable second-hand chairs had been installed, and a judicious arrangement of lights in the alley, supplemented by a board walk leading to the side door, that entered into the theatre, made it a fairly presentable lobby.

Things didn't go with a whoop from the start. People were slow to place themselves open to conviction, and many chairs were vacant six nights a week. But Mr. Rothapfel had pried deep and unearthed a business possibility. Many of the miners were foreigners, and these silent, hard-handed men, understanding little of America and its ways and somewhat prone to suspicion of their neighbors' intent, were loath to mingle with the strangers, who thronged the remaining two theatres. They did not mind the little alley leading to the side door of the former dance hall, nor did they care particularly about its former history.

So they came, slowly at first, and then in increased numbers, when they found the theatre spotlessly clean, the air sweet and pure, the pictures of the kind that appealed most strongly to their pleasure-loving and highly impressionable natures, the manager courteous and always smiling. They understood that smile, whether or not they grasped the meaning of the kindly spoken "good evening," and the pleasant "good night." They felt that they were welcome, and that here was one who allowed no one to laugh and ridicule their quaint manner of dress and the odd little topknots of hair affected by their women.

The patronage grew greater as weeks passed. The man who wanted to become an exhibitor had achieved the first little corner of his ambition. He had established a theatre that gave every indication of becoming a permanent institution in the community. But he didn't stop there, flushed with his first success, for the theatre already was yielding a nice profit weekly.

* * * *

THIS, he explains, with the same smile that won for him the friendship and support of the foreign miners, and which has figured actively in his later success, is where the halt is called by numbers so great as to be almost appalling. Encouraged to the point of over-confidence and with the feeling that a final success has been achieved, there are many who cease the consistent effort and vigilance that has brought the first triumphs, and hence plunge into the downward path.

No success is permanent in a business where competition is to be encountered. Always there must be a forging ahead, progress of a kind that commands attention, improvements, however small, that contribute to the aggregate items of genuine success. An exhibitor, once satisfied with his attainments as such, is no longer an exhibitor. He is a failure.

Rothapfel passed this dangerous pitfall warily. He reserved six hours each day for rest, and the remaining eighteen were devoted religiously to the accomplishments of one purpose—extending the waiting line each night still farther down the block, perfecting his system of management, experimenting for better projection, a brighter, steadier and clearer light on the screen, and in other ways by which he could awaken a latent interest in his theatre among the patrons of his competitors. The foreigners noted, marvelled, and then came in increased numbers.

Every exhibitor has virtually the same difficulties in managing his theatre, viewed from a general standpoint, but not all meet them in the same fashion. One night a commandment was broken in this theatre that had once served as a dance hall, and later as a store-room. That commandment was cleanliness. Two men, employed jointly as ushers and cleaners, fulfilled the former duty with the audience, but in a spirit of independence, failed in the latter.

An angry but determined employer arrived early the next morning. There were the same muddy tracks on the floor, that had been left the previous night by rain-soaked shoes; the usual adornment of peanut shells, empty candy bags, a stray handkerchief or hair pin. There was no waiting, no hesitation. The theatre was to open for a Saturday matinee, and the reels were yet to be examined, the machine overhauled, and the posters to be hung. The same temptation, which had lured away the two employees the evening before, still held them in its grasp, for neither reported at the usual time.

* * * *

INTO a small storeroom plunged the proprietor, and a minute later he emerged armed with a pair of overalls, a mop, pail and a plentiful supply of soap. Down on his hands and knees he went, and fairly drove that scrubbing brush into the floor by his energy. Then came the mopping, the dusting of the chairs, and an hour later, spattered with dirty water, his face dripping perspiration, he completed the task. That night two new ushers helped him greet the patrons, but the theatre was spotlessly clean, and the proprietor had lived up to his standard.

Fall passed into winter, and with the passing came storms of a violence and force little known outside the prison-gray confines of the mining territory. The exchanges serving the three theatres in the little town were eight miles away by railroad. Reels were shipped out each morning on a local that brought many workers to the mines from the close-in suburbs of the bigger city, and then were sent back on a late train at night.

The arrangement was satisfactory, but unreliable, although none gave thought to the latter. Railroads are far from infallible where storms compel consideration.

Rothapfel's following had increased greatly after the first month. His two competitors bid for a higher priced service, and an earlier run, when the barroom itself was torn down to make way for a new front to the new theatre. The remodeling, in its completed form, presented a type of theatre new to the little mining city. Profits of the first six months were religiously hoarded, and then paid to contractors, decorators, electricians, chair manufacturers, and accessory concerns.

The change brought new patrons, among them business men, their wives and children. Business opportunities had increased a hundredfold for him, but still the proprietor was not satisfied. If he had accomplished all this here, in a comparatively small period of time, why could he not accomplish still greater things as an exhibitor. Another happening that tested the qualities in him that make for success came without warning.

HE awoke one morning in January to greet a raging snowstorm, rushing over the valley and propelled by a sixty mile gale. No train arrived at the usual hour, and hence no reels for the day's show. The storm increased in violence as the morning wore away, and Rothapfel's two competitors cursed the elements. Then both decided to close their houses until the next day.

The third exhibitor waited until 11 o'clock, when word came feebly and uncertain over the railroad telegraph wire that no traffic would be possible for another twenty-four hours. Fifteen minutes later, with no word of information to anyone, a fur-wrapped figure plunged from the depot steps into the very face of the terrific snowstorm, and set out toward the city where his reels rested in the files of the exchange. His two competitors were safely at home, figuring an approximate week's profit after deducting the probable day's receipts, but that was not his fashion of doing things.

On he plunged, stumbling, and sometimes falling, using the narrow strips of rail as his guide. For long distances these would be covered by drifted snow, and often he strayed from the tracks. Then, after what seemed hours, he reached his goal, obtained his reels from the surprised and incredible exchangemen, ate a hearty dinner, and started back.

It was ten minutes before the regular time of opening the theatre when he stumbled in, half frozen and almost fainting. But at promptly 7 o'clock the arc lamps in front of the theatre burst into light, and by 8 o'clock twenty people, all of them living within two blocks of the theatre, were watching the show.

His business increased with leaps and bounds after that. Everyone talked of his feat in walking eight miles to obtain entertainment for the few of sufficient courage to brave the storm for two blocks, or less, while his two competitors remained safely at home. He had proven that he could be relied upon, that disappointments were not permitted at his theatre, not so much in the matter of keeping open, but in the style and quality of show he gave.

Editor's Note—Owing to the unusual length of this article and the requirements of our space, we have found it necessary to divide it into two parts, the second of which, dealing with the later artistic and commercial success of Mr. Rothapfel in the exhibitor's field, will be published in the forthcoming issue of the Motion Picture News.

New Reliance Studio a Model in Every Respect

THE new Mutual studio just completed for the Reliance Company on the Clara Morris estate at Yonkers, N. Y., is one of the most practical studios for making motion pictures in this country.

It is of skeleton steel construction and white ground glass with surprisingly slender trusses that span the whole width of the studio, fifty feet, without supporting posts of any kind. The entire roof and three sides are of ground glass, the sides being of portable glass, which may be removed in the Summer. The roof of the studio floor is thirty-one feet at its apex, with regulating ventilators, which operate from the floor level on each side of the middle ridge.

The height of the sides of the studio is seventeen feet to the eaves, with another row of regulating ventilators underneath the eaves. The base of the side walls, two feet above the floor level, is concrete and carries the pipe coils for steam heating. The building is one hundred feet by fifty, providing an uninterrupted area of five thousand square feet, equipped with necessary traps, etc.

The studio itself is elevated fifteen feet above ground level to admit the necessary lateral light. The basement will be used for factory purposes. Against the north wall of the studio are located the scene dock and painter's frame. It is pierced in the middle by a large door intended for entrance into an adjoining building, to be built later for the reception and storage of properties and additional dressing-rooms on the second floor.

Extending along the entire length of the studio floor are suspended three parallel overhead trolleys for transporting the artificial light to any desired point. When the day is dark a few extra quartz lights, combined with the daylight, will produce perfect pictures, giving the same degree of light underneath the brim of a person's hat as above it.

For combining artificial and daylight in taking pictures the studio is a model of economy. Two months more of the sun's rays will further bleach the arsenical ground-glass to an absolutely dead white. Permanganese glass bleaches pinkish, which is bad for the light rays.

THE MOTION PICTURE IN CANADA

BY CHANDOS ST. JOHN-BRENON

IT is an extraordinary fact, that wide as are the opportunities offered in the Dominion of Canada for the moving picture manufacturer and producer, the leaders of both branches of this wonderful industry have not yet seen to it that films of Canadian make and Canadian subjects have been placed on the Canadian market for the residents of the Dominion. The possibilities are tremendous, yet the field is at present in almost virgin state.

Especially does this apply to Western Canada, where there is to-day a tremendous market for the film in all its phases, dramatic and educational. It cannot be that the big men among the manufacturers have entirely ignored this field and it certainly is not because there is no demand in Canada for pictures of Canadian tone and motif. Canada to-day is linked up throughout its entire length and breadth with societies and associations large and small, which have been formed to keep alive the idea of imperialism, and the members of which have, at regular and stated intervals, voiced their disapproval of the constant appearance of that fine old emblem "Old Glory" on the moving picture screen.

Not that they have the least dislike or disrespect for that flag. Such is far from being the case and should not be thus interpreted.

Nevertheless, it is but natural that exception should be taken to the continual appearance of the American flag and American subjects throughout the entire Dominion where films are known, and there is obviously some ground for this feeling. It is strange, therefore, that manufacturers have thus far ignored the demands of the great Canadian west and have given only such subjects as they have seen fit to the big motion picture public in this territory.

* * * *

ABORTIVE efforts have been made from time to time by manufacturers to turn out a Canadian picture, but these efforts have proven such utter failures that even small children in the audiences of Canadian theatres where such pictures have been shown have laughed aloud at the incongruities, the impossible scenery and the even more impossible costuming, as well as the obvious ignorance of things Canadian displayed by the producer.

In the heart of the great West is planted a body of men who have won the admiration of the world, wherever the English language is spoken, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. Could any moving picture producer find a more prolific field, a more popular field for a Canadian audience? Is any field more crowded with adventure, history, instances of individual and collective courage, pluck, romance, life and color? Yet this field, which is so essentially Canadian and which teems with such splendid material dealing with the history of the Canadian West, has been absolutely ignored save on one or two occasions.

One of these occasions is a memorable one in Winnipeg at least. It was when a two-reel film purporting to deal with the Royal Northwest Mounted Police was widely advertised. When it was thrown on the screen, it aroused an uproar and it was taken off as quickly as it was put on. In Winnipeg resides one of the finest figures ever identified with the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, in fact, the first man to join its ranks, and a man who has helped to make western Canadian history.

This is Col. S. B. Steele, C. B. M. V. O., the officer commanding the military district. With his staff he had been invited to see the great picture and he had signified his intention of being present. Who is there who does not known the boast of Canada's mounted police? "We have never lost a man upon whom we have once laid our hands. We have never taken a bribe."

Yet the film shown with such noise and pride in the local house, depicted a member of this body accepting a bribe from a woman! The audience hissed and the film was relegated to the shelf, whence it should never have been removed. Fortunately the former superintendent did not see the film. Many angry voices were later raised in protest and the same feelings were expressed as would have been the case had a picture been shown in any United States city which held up to scorn and contumely the United States Navy or Army.

* * * *

CANADA to-day needs Canadian pictures and when it gets them the receipts of those who make them will go upwards with a bound. The same complaint of "too much United States" applies to the various and numerous "weeklies" or news pictures. To-day ninety per cent show scenes taken in American cities which are of absolutely no interest to a Canadian audience. When these "weeklies" depict scenes of international interest, of course, any audience appreciates them.

But wherein lies the interest to a Canadian audience in pictures of the ruins wrought by a $100,000 fire in Akron, Ohio, or Jonesboro, Arkansas? Canadian cities have just as big fires and if one is to judge by the statisticans, the fire loss in Canada is far heavier per capita than in the United States.

Why are not Canadian pictures shown? Canadian managers ask for them, Canadian audiences ask for them. Are not interntional pictures desirable? Yes! These are wanted all the time. But news pictures from minor United States cities should only be distributed where the interest lies. Two years ago the Duke of Connaught, an international figure, the uncle of the King of England paid a visit to the West, yet an infinitesimal percentage of "Weaklies" made any effort to show the Canadian public what he did or how he looked.

Western Canada is still in the pioneer stage, at least to a great degree. It is still much of a "hinterland" to thousands of English-speaking people, and, as such, offers a wonderful field, if only to show the wonderful strides made in half a century of civilization and exploration. Imagine the possibilities of the numerous railroad construction camps! Imagine the tales which could be built around them and the wonderful pictures made, and above all, consider the hundreds of thousands of people who would enjoy films of their own country, telling stories of their own country, made in their own country.

* * * *

THE time is not so remote when Canada will offer almost as large a market for the motion picture as the United States. Winnipeg, the capital of Manitoba, with a population of 200,000 has thirty motion picture theatres. This is small, of course, in comparison to the number in the larger American cities, but eight years ago there were not three which were wholly devoted to the picture. A few days ago a four-year lease on one of the second-class houses in Winnipeg was sold for $40,000 and added to this is the rent for those four years at $500 a month. Surely this is indicative of the situation in the west of Canada. Of all the theatres which have been erected in the past five years (some eighteen), not one has closed its doors. And this in the face of two vaudeville houses and a popular stock house.

Competition for exclusiveness has reached a high pitch and exclusiveness in programs has been eagerly sought after. The latest innovation is from the Mutual, which gives an exclusive program with a guarantee that none

PICTURIZING BROADWAY

BROADWAY, New York, is the theatrical centre and stronghold of America. There theatres flourish the thickest. There fame is won or lost. There a show is made or broken. For years it has presented at night an unbroken chain of white lights heralding theatrical attractions.

Now comes the motion picture, no longer in its infancy, but coping, by right of merit, with theatrical attractions and in their own stronghold. Times Square is the heart of the theatrical district. But a few weeks from now will see four big Times Square theatres devoted exclusively to motion pictures.

The new Strand Theatre, at Forty-seventh Street and Broadway, heads the list. This theatre, now almost completed is a magnificent white structure towering above Broadway. Some time ago it was announced that G. M. Anderson, "Broncho Billy," would produce in it musical comedies at a dollar, following the policy of his Gayety theatre in San Francisco. Now that is changed and the Strand will be a motion picture theatre. But it will be an impressive one.

S. L. Rothapfel, now managing the Regent at 116th Street and Seventh Avenue, will manage the Strand. He will show all the good pictures he can get his hands on, program pictures, feature and so on, at prices which will surely run up to fifty cents and possibly reach a dollar.

Mr. Rothapfel is the Belasco of exhibitors. In this new theatre he will introduce in addition to his own stunts which have always been so successful, a number of brand new effects. Mr. Rothapfel believes in a big orchestra which he rehearses every morning with the pictures of the day.

The theatre which George Kleine is building in West Forty-second Street to house big foreign features is nearing completion. This is the first theatre in the country built simply for the exhibition of big features. Prices will run up to a dollar. Mr. Kleine is now over in Europe picking up good subjects running from six to nine reels. These he will show in his new theatre which will have the pretentiousness of a theatre housing speaking attractions, and more comforts.

THEN come the converts. The Vitagraph Company of America has been announced as having secured the Criterion Theatre at Forty-fourth Street and Broadway. Here will be shown the big Vitagraph-Liebler feature productions. This step is important as it may be the entering wedge to the Vitagraph producing many more big pictures and acquiring a chain of big theatres.

The Universal Film Manufacturing Company has secured the Republic Theatre in West Forty-second street and is showing "Traffic in Souls" there, "The Temperamental Journey" having concluded its engagement. "Traffic in Souls" is also showing at Weber's at Broadway and Twenty-ninth street, at three theatres in Brooklyn and at two in uptown New York. "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic" is showing at the Park Theatre, Columbus Circle. Hammerstein's Victoria is now featuring motion pictures.

Motion pictures are fast colonizing Broadway. They are nudging the legitimate in its own stronghold and are demanding room—and getting it. Surely this is encouraging enough to please all interested in the motion drama.

EXCLUSIVE TO OPEN NEW EXCHANGES

TO open exchanges in territories in which the Exclusive program is not being adequately supported and exploited is the big plan of the Exclusive Supply Corporation. Action is expected at an early date.

This move is the natural evolution of the policy of the Exclusive, which, while having every reason to believe in the pulling and profitable power of their feature program, will let the program work for them in imperfectly developed territories as it has worked for exchange-men in other territories.

None of the buyers now handling the Exclusive program will be disturbed, the Exclusive intending to concentrate their energies upon States where business has not been commensurate with the immediate and active possibilities this feature program affords.

It is certain that an efficient organization, backed up by the "goods," will demonstrate that many territories hitherto overlooked and neglected by local exchange-men, who have overlooked their existing possibilities, are fertile fields for development.

At several night meetings in the offices of the Exclusive in the Candler Building, New York City, at which were present Herbert Blache, president; Ingvald C. Oes, vice-president; Harry R. Raver, secretary and treasurer, and Joseph R. Miles, general manager, the move was given consideration. Their report in favor of it was unanimously affirmative.

The best exchange-men will be engaged and the program launched with a thoroughness and vim which assures its success. A study of conditions throughout the United States, conducted by an expert, has revealed statistically proved possibilities and probabilities for the Exclusive program, which merits the large investment required.

Should the negotiations go through as now expected, the Exclusive's offices will of necessity be augmented and the staff doubled or trebled. There would be no change in management.

The feature rental business on a big scale, with an unprecedented advertising policy, will be entered upon by a widely known theatrical manager within a few weeks. The territory will be New York City and State and New England. The Exclusive program almost intact will be contracted for for a term of years. Thousands of sheets of lithographs will be taken on each release and displayed in circus style.

The feature situation in Texas has given impetus to fierce competition, there being no less than five individuals and corporations now bidding for the Exclusive program.

MAKING THE MOTION PICTURE SAFER

Dussaud's Discovery of a Way to Produce Light without Heat Has Opened Important Fields to Science—The Fireproof Film No Longer a Dream of the Future

TWO recent inventions promise to make motion picture theatres safer. That sources of danger exist under present conditions is certain. In his last annual report the State Fire Marshal of New York said:

"It has been estimated that throughout the country there is on an average a daily attendance of 15,000,000 in these places. They are exposed to dangers from fire and the resulting panic. More than $100,000,000 is invested in the business in the Union, and this is divided among 16,000 theatres and many halls, churches and clubs. There should be ordinances governing the storage and handling of films, which are generally made of a composition of nitrocellulose and guncotton, one of the most inflammable combinations known."

Within the past few weeks officers of the Paris Prefecture of Police have tested picture films made non-inflammable by a new method. So satisfactory were the results that it is now an offense for motion picture shows in Paris to use anything else than these safety films.

When it was announced that the Parisian authorities had decided to order the substitution of non-inflammable films Thomas A. Edison was asked if he thought the same course should be followed in this country. Mr. Edison does not agree with the French officials in the matter. He said:

"There is no possible material known that takes the place of the present celluloid film. In this country the insurance companies have been so strict that everything pertaining to the film and machine is encased in iron and asbestos, so that the chance of a fire is reduced almost to immunity. Out of 13,000 motion picture theatres we scarcely ever hear of a fire, although the theatres are running almost continuously. The amount of film stored in the fireproof booth at any one time is so small that it is difficult to imagine any danger to the theatre even if the whole amount should burn up. A properly designed machine provides immunity aside from the fireproof booth."

* * * *

NOTWITHSTANDING the opinion of so great an authority, the fact remains that a safety film has been produced which has all of the mechanical and optical virtues of ordinary celluloid minus its menace, and the world owes this achievement to the cunning of the German chemists of the famous color works of Friedrich Bayer & Co., of Elberfeld. They first produced a film material from acetylcellulose in aceton, and called it cellit. According to Dr. Carl Duisberg, president of one of the greatest chemical industries in the world, in Germany, "Cellit films in all their properties are equal to the old inflammable ones, yet the proprietors of motion picture theatres have not taken them up because they feared the competition of the schools and the home, where the cellit films would be largely used on account of their non-inflammability."

The German police or fire authorities have not been slow in recognizing the merits of cellit, and even though the first cost of films made of it is greater than that of celluloid, still the substitution of the safer material has been required. Now the French are not disposed to welcome German ideas, and the fact that the Parisian police have passed a similar ordinance is evidence of the need of this kind of legislation.

The French and the Germans have been exacting for a long time regarding other precautions in the way of security against fire in motion picture theatres, and yet they realized that existing precautions were not in themselves enough to guard against the perils of a panic when a film burst into flame. It must not be supposed that actual contact with the projecting light has necessarily been the cause of most of the fires in these theatres. The danger has been of a more insidious nature.

CONCENTRATED sunlight focussed by means of a magnifying glass will produce fire. The lens from a pair of spectacles will do this, so the focussing medium need not be a powerful one when the sun is the source of light. In motion picture apparatus the projecting lenses are capable of condensing intensely the artificial illuminant. This produces a high temperature, and when centered for a little while upon an inflammable substance like celluloid the result is not hard to imagine. The danger is not so great when the film strip is sweeping through the beam of light at high speed, but every now and then a picture is held upon the screen for a short while, and this is the act which invites a catastrophe.

Such are the dangers incident to using celluloid films and the light heretofore available, but if Mr. Edison is right in advocating the use of these inflammable strips, then there is another remedy at hand in the form of a new illuminant—M. François Dussaud's "cold light." No matter how intensely the glow of his lamp is concentrated substantially no menacing heat is created, and apart from the element of safety, a gain is made which promises to revolutionize the motion picture in other ways.

This invention is man's most successful effort to simulate the glow of the firefly, which is well-nigh totally lacking in heat.

The firefly's light is phosphorescent, and the manner of its making is one of nature's chemical mysteries, but scientists have proved that only 3.5 per cent. of the energy expended is lost in producing heat. No wonder physicists call the firefly's glow ideal, for the best man can get to-day out of the efficient mercury vapor lamp is half light and half heat for a given expenditure of electrical energy. A surprising part of M. Dussaud's invention is the fact that he is using electricity and not phosphorescent chemicals, and the substance of his lamp filaments is the same that is to be found in the bulk of the best incandescent bulbs.

* * * *

ACCORDING to M. Dussaud, his cold light apparatus will produce the equivalent illumination of the ordinary electric light upon a consumption of current 100 per cent. less. Don't think this means that he gets his glow without cost in current, but he gets it at an expenditure of current which would give too little light to be of any value in the usual run of electric lamps.

The better a conductor of electricity a metal may be the less it will heat when current speeds through it. When the material hampers the electricity in its flow—technically this is called resistance—then heat is created, and if this opposition be sufficient the wire or filament will turn red, then orange, then a light yellow, and at last be nearly white in its incandescence.

When it reaches the last stage it is usually pretty close to the melting point, or, if not that, at least it dissipates itself in tiny particles and in time breaks. This, in brief, is the life history of the filaments of most incandescent lamps. This element of resistance incidentally controls the cost of light by reason of the current consumed.

The heating up of the delicate wire producing the illumination represents just so much loss, for heat is not light. In the case of the carbon filament lamp we got 6 per cent. of light with 94 per cent. of heat, and the tungsten filament of to-day has reduced this loss and increased the efficiency by quite 50 per cent. But, even so, there is an enormous waste in the generation of heat.

* * * *

KEEP this fact about the tungsten filament in mind, because M. Dussaud uses this very metal in his own lamps. Tungsten can stand a higher heat than carbon before reaching the melting point. This results in greater incandescence, and because of a peculiarity of this metal it uses less current than carbon when glowing brightest. Of course you understand that it might be made to shine even more intensely by crowding an overload of current through the filament, but its life would be a short one; therefore people have had to be content with less light.

These facts seem to offer obstacles to the generation of colder light, and yet this ingenious Frenchman has dodged around these hindrances. Perhaps you have raised yourself upon a crossbar, "chinned" it once, twice, three times or more. The first lift was easy, and each succeeding one harder and harder. With a sufficient rest between efforts, however, all of them became quite as easy as the first one. You have had a chance to recuperate. You are doing this very thing between breaths, and when you overwork your lungs by violent breathing you are soon exhausted. These are simple analogies which have had their lessons for M. Dussaud in perfecting his cold light apparatus.

By long experimenting he found that he could overload his tungsten filament two and a half times that of the normal voltage provided he did this for only a brief while. He could do this repeatedly without hurting the delicate wire if he gave the tungsten a chance to rest before calling it into service again. In figures, where his lamp would require, say, one watt per candle power, he obtained in this fashion for an instant the same measure of light at an expenditure of only two-tenths of that energy.

* * * *

BUT you will promptly object to a blinking light of this description. Offhand, this sort of illumination would ruin the eyes in short order. How, then, did M. Dussaud make his experiments of practical value?

He obtains a steady lighting effect by using a combination of lamps. Each lamp of this group shines for a moment and then rests while its companions take their turn. Now, the manner in which one lamp relieves the other is so skillfully adjusted that the effect is that of a single lamp glowing continuously. There is no blink.

Even so, this does not make for cold light. It is plain that the tungsten filament is standing for the briefest while a severe tax, and this overloading with current produces superior incandescence, which is another term for higher temperature. Certainly this is not getting any nearer to coldness in the film. But the cunning part of the scheme lies in the fact that the tungsten glows for so short a time that the heat waves generated actually don't pass beyond the confines of the glass bulb. It is this very brevity of incandescence that does the trick.

However, this accomplishment would not be possible if M. Dussaud employed the usual form of filament. While he uses tungsten he so shapes his filament that the dazzling area is larger than that commonly given to the lamp of the same size, and in this manner he multiplies the volume of the light produced. This permits of the effective and efficient utilizing of the flood of current he pours into his lamp for the instant.

Because of the very moderate amount of electrical energy actually needed to maintain a light of this sort M. Dussaud believes it is possible to get this current from very modest sources. Indeed, he has said that the water of a spigot will drive a dynamo of sufficient power to run a cold light installation large enough to work a motion picture outfit for home service; that is, to produce the needful cold light. And it is this Frenchman's idea to promote, among other things, the motion picture in the household.

But it is for the cinematograph generally that the discovery promises the most valuable results. Because the Dussaud light is cold it will not ignite the films, and this gives it an added importance both as a discovery and from a commercial viewpoint.

* * * *

TO-DAY, the motion picture is giving reproductions of visible life lying within the range of the ordinary camera. But M. Dussaud proposes to make visible those phases of nature that come only within the range of the microscope. This means that pictures infinitely small can be taken upon films of exquisite thinness, and, because cold light will be used, these tiny images can be magnified without danger by powerful lenses and made of a size that everybody can see. This will widen immensely nature studies for schools and likewise broaden the investigating capacity of the man of science.

It seems that cold light does not disturb or alarm some miniature forms of life as daylight would or the run of artificial illuminants.

According to M. Dussaud his cold light is rich in ultra-violet rays which, so he says, are "obtained for the first time without heat." According to the latest scientific pronouncements the ultra-violet rays and the X-ray are substantially identical. Therefore it seems likely that shadowgraphs may be obtained by an entirely new process.

That is, instead of sending the light through the entire body in order to secure a negative, the same thing can perhaps be done, and better done at that, by internal illumination, thus reducing by half or more the mass of the body substance through which the rays have to pass to reach the photographic plate. These pictures may be microscopic and they may be moving, and through the agency of the same cold light may be cast upon the screen for study.

MICHIGAN EXHIBITORS HOLD CONVENTION

MEMBERS of the Michigan Motion Picture Exhibitors' League held their semi-annual meeting at the Wenonah Hotel, Bay City, Mich., on Dec. 9 and 10, and many important matters were discussed or disposed of during the session.

The meeting was called to order by Peter J. Jenf. There was a large number of delegates from all parts of the state, and they all seemed to be present with the definite purpose of upholding the present three and five reel program rule now in vogue. Hearty expressions of the utmost satisfaction were given with the working of the present resolution that the limit for five cents admissions be three reels, with five reels for ten cents.

A letter was received from Billy Welsh, secretary of the Kansas City League, congratulating the Michigan Exhibitors on the ideal arrangement they had made in relation to their three and five reel programs, and asking for more complete information as to just how the Michigan exhibitors accomplished such wonderful results.

This information was furnished by the president, in the hope that Kansas City, and possibly the entire state of Missouri, would soon be able to say "We too" have a three and five reel program.

A letter was also read from President Neff of the National League expressing his best wishes for the continued success of the Michigan League, and urging them to keep up the good work. Among the telegrams received was one from A. J. Gillingham, manager of the Detroit branch of the General Film Company, who was in New York, regretting that he could not be present, but assuring the convention that he

THE MAKING OF A BOY SCOUT

A Feature of Exceptional Merit and Purpose—President Wilson Poses in and Endorses Picture, Which Has Wide Support

MANY persons are watching with interest the ease with which a six-reel drama, "The Making of a Scout," is made the subject of first-page newspaper stories. The secret of this remarkable publicity for a motion picture play, aside from the merits of the drama itself, is to be found in the fact that it has the unqualified endorsement of the most prominent men in the country, among them being President Wilson, Theodore Roosevelt, Gifford Pinchot and Judge Ben Lindsey. President Wilson gave his stamp of approval when for the first time since his election he consented to pose for the picture.

For the purpose of trying it out the producers of the picture have given a few private exhibitions. These have met with marked success. Newspapers have printed first-page stories and editorials urging their readers to see the picture; boards of education have authorized the sale of tickets in public schools. Department stores have bought tickets for the purpose of sending their juvenile employees to the show, and have put advertising display cards on their counters.

Theodore Roosevelt Approves

As a self-advertising proposition, "The Making of a Scout" seems to be without an equal. The following extracts from facsimile letters have been authorized for reproduction:

Theodore Roosevelt—"I am extremely glad that this picture drama is to appear."

Julge Lindsey—"It is positively one of the greatest feature films yet produced in this country."

Gifford Pinchot—"I want to send you my heartiest congratulations on it as not only a most useful but a most attractive thing to see."

The drama in the picture is woven about a street boy who becomes a member of the Boy Scouts of America. It therefore has a direct appeal to the four hundred thousand Boy Scouts in the United States. These boys stand ready to conduct an advance sale of tickets, because the fundamental law of the scout is to spread the gospel of his organization.

The picture, which is owned by the Wedepict Motion Picture Corporation, 115 Broadway, New York City, has the endorsement of the National Council, Boy Scouts of America, and under the terms of the contract between the producing corporation and the National Scout officials, it is the only Scout picture which can be shown with such endorsement for a period of years.

Interest in the picture throughout the country has been aroused through the columns of two scout magazines which have a national circulation, with the result that local scout officials appeal to motion picture house owners to produce the films. Requests for the picture have come to New York from practically every State in the Union.

The Public Interested

A remarkable feature in connection with the picture is the ease with which the public is interested. In one city recently one thousand letters, each containing four tickets to the show, were sent to a selected list of citizens. When returns were all in it was found that one out of every three letters brought back a check for one dollar. In the same city the street car company carried posters on the dashboards of the cars free of charge In another city the school children were given a half holiday in order that they might attend a special matinee.

In Richmond, Va., Governor Mann wrote a public letter endorsing the picture, in which he said: "I am sure that every citizen and every boy and girl in Richmond will benefit from seeing this play, endorsed by such great men as President Wilson, Jacob Riis, Judge Lindsey and others."

In that city the production of the picture was preceded by a speech by John Garland Pollard, Attorney-General of the State.

In a column story about the picture, the Richmond Times-Leader said: "Naturally the Scouts are very much gratified to know that the Governor is actively interested in their work, and they are especially delighted that the Governor is urging the people to see the play. The prospects are that there will be a record crowd in attendance.

Free Tickets Provided

"Through W. G. Sales, local manager of the Western Union, the announcement has been made that the Western Union believes so much in the possibility of 'The Making of a Scout' that it will provide every one of its messengers with a ticket for the play. W. J. Parish, manager of the Richmond Cedar Works, will do as much for the boys employed by his company, and there will no doubt be a good many other employers who will be glad to afford their boys an opportunity to see this photoplay."

In Richmond one Boy Scout sold 260 tickets.

The appeal of the picture seems to be a particularly wide one, and as an educational feature it is of highest merit. The picture was produced under the direction of Edward Warren, and is excellent in photography, setting and full of dramatic interest. An inspiriting romance threads together the novel scenes of the Boy Scouts' life and work.

IRISH PILGRIMAGE TO LOURDES FILMED

THE Irish Pilgrimage to Lourdes has been described as "the act of a nation." Beyond all question it was the act of a nation, for practically every man, woman and child in Ireland interested himself or herself in the project from the moment it was first mooted, a year ago. The Most Rev. Dr. McHugh, Bishop of Derry, whose portrait appears in the film now being distributed by the General Film Agency, Ltd., was its moving spirit, and the undertaking, colossal to such a country as Ireland, was carried through, by dint of hard work, much personal economy, and a superabundance of faith, to a complete and happy conclusion.

It should be borne in mind that a pilgrimage from Ireland to Lourdes was a far more difficult undertaking than a pilgrimage from any part of the Continent. The business of transporting the sick from Ireland to England, followed by a long and tedious journey to London, the second sea trip across the English Channel, and, finally, the weary train journey from the very north of France to the Pyrenees must have taxed the endurance of the sick to the uttermost. The safe transport of over 3,000 pilgrims under these conditions was in itself a veritable triumph of organization.

Some of the most affecting scenes shown in the film are those at Victoria Station, in London, and at Folkstone. The pilgrims have left Dublin the night before, and are breaking their journey in London for a hurried breakfast, which is snatched on the station itself. London policemen are carrying litters, and cheerful porters, having turned nurses for the time being, are tenderly rendering invaluable assistance. The station is shrouded in the peculiar gloom of a London morning, and yet the blend of Celtic cheerfulness and Saxon readiness for emergencies renders the atmosphere far from oppressive. It is a scene that one would like to see rendered later on by the subtle brush of some clever painter.

At Folkstone you are equally impressed. Here porters and policemen have given place to brown-faced sailors, careful and anxious bearers of the sick and crippled.

We will pass over the rest of the journey until we reach Lourdes, mountain-girdled, full of charm and scented with the sweet air of the Pyrennees. Here we are mere units in the crowds of pilgrims, all hurrying to the great objectives, the Basilica and the Grotto.

A night's rest, and then commences the real business of the pilgrimage, which lasts three days. There is a first day's procession to the great white Basilica, the unveiling of a stately Keltic Cross by Cardinal Logue, and visits to the Grotto where Bernadette first saw the sacred apparitions. A visit has also to be paid to the little gabled house where she lived.

Most important of all, however, is the procession of the Blessed Sacrament. This solemn and awe-inspiring scene, when a wonderful vista is given of the Basilica and of the long, serried lines of the pilgrims, before whom are laid the sufferers in their litters, is an unforgettable sight. Nothing like this has ever been brought to the eyes of those who know Lourdes only as a name, and it should be remembered that this procession was never taken before His Eminence Cardinal Logue gave express permission to the General Film Agency, Ltd., to take it.

Possibly the pictures which will arouse the greatest public interest are those which appear at the end of the film and show the miraculous cures. The names are given: Grace Maloney, the Killaloe girl who was cured and her bent leg straightened, so that she now walks like any other fine-limbed Irish colleen; Patrick Casey, who left home absolutely helpless, and who left his crutches at Lourdes, and also Miss B. J. McDonogh, Cabragh, County Sligo, who suffered from a diseased bone in the left foot.

PAPERS SERVED IN "QUO VADIS" SUIT

Paul de Outo was served by a United States marshal while leaving his office in Chicago, on December 17, in connection with the suit filed November 28 by George Kleine in the United States District Court, alleging infringement of copyright. De Outo operated what was known as the "Quo Vadis Film Company," of Chicago, although the company did not appear to have been incorporated under the laws of the state of Illinois. It is understood that he marketed a picture called "Quo Vadis," in three reels.

Recently George Kleine warned exhibitors that a series of suits are pending in the United States District Court against infringements of lithographs, heralds, etc., and it is said that many exhibitors have been unknowingly guilty of violations of the copyright law. While Mr. Kleine is said not to desire to punish anyone, he feels it necessary to vigorously prosecute these infringements in the interests of the exhibitor as well as his own.

FOX SECURES "HERO OF A NATION"

William A. Fox, the well-known theatrical manager, has secured the rights for New York City and State on "The Hero of a Nation, Bar-Cochba," the Supreme Feature Film Company's big six-reel production.

This feature is being shown at the Folly Theatre, in Brooklyn, and is drawing large crowds. It is one of the most spectacular features ever produced and has as many as one hundred and twenty-five thrilling scenes.

THE "THIRD DEGREE" ON THE SCREEN

THE first of the Photoplay Masterpieces which the General Film Company will release by the new service which it will soon inaugurate has reached the screen. The first public exhibition of the Lubin five-part production of Charles Klein's famous drama, "The Third Degree," was given last Monday at the American Theatre, Forty-second street and Eighth avenue, New York City.

Taking this production as a criterion, the new service, which will endeavor to supply films long enough to furnish an evening's entertainment at the rate of one a week, will be enthusiastically received. The Lubin production of "The Third Degree" is meritorious enough to compose a satisfactory evening's entertainment in itself.

THE COURTROOM SCENE

Settings and Players Good

This motion picture is the result of considerable work. For a long time the forces of the big Lubin plant were concentrated upon it. It was produced by Barry O'Neil, then head director.

The settings, without exception, live fully up to the demands of the story. Interiors of the house of Jeffries, Sr., of the courthouse and police station and an exceptionally good courtroom set were noticeable.

To secure the players, actors and actresses were carefully picked from the Lubin forces. Gaston Bell, late of Kinemacolor, plays Howard Jeffries, Jr., while Carlotta Doti is Anne, his wife. Robert Dunbar is well cast and does some fine work as Howard Jeffries, the father, with Lillie Leslie as his wife. Bernard Siegel is a perfect type and a good actor as Dr. Bernstein. Others in the cast are George Soule Spencer as Richard Brewster, Robert Whittier as Robert Underwood, Robert Graham, Jr., as a bellboy and Bartley McCullum as the police captain. McCullum had a difficult part. The police captain of the play possesses a strong, hypnotic will. This idea of forcefulness McCullum tried hard to portray.

The action of the motion picture parallels that of the play, which so gripped audiences for a long time, but the picture has more material in it.

The action starts before the action of the play did. The opening of the picture shows young Jeffries and Underwood chums at college. Some very good campus scenes are shown. Young Jeffries, feeling too good, hurts the feelings of a waitress, Annie, in a college café. The next day he goes in and apologizes. Incidentally good scenes of a college football game are shown. Young Jeffries gets to gambling and is finally expelled, but not before Underwood has borrowed money from him. Howard and the waitress, now fast friends, are married. Meanwhile Howard's father, a widower, marries again, the lady being an old flame of Underwood and his patron as an art student.

When Howard brings his wife home his father disowns him. Underwood has opened a studio, using the name of Mrs. Jeffries, Sr., to draw patronage. But he is caught in shady deals with spurious masterpieces. She withdraws her support and things go ill for Underwood financially. Underwood makes a last appeal to Mrs. Jeffries, threatening suicide if she does not come to his aid.

The "Third Degree" Is Inflicted

Meanwhile things have been going from bad to worse with Howard and his wife. He takes to drinking again. She gets a job as a waitress in Childs' and takes in washing. One night Howard is too convivial. He goes to Underwood's studio to ask for the money owed him and falls asleep on the sofa. At this time Mrs. Jeffries comes in. Underwood throws a screen around the sleeping Howard.

After a stormy interview Underwood makes good. He shoots himself. When the police arrive Howard is naturally held for the death.

Captain Clinton, in an impressive scene, puts him through the "third degree." Three men, Howard, the captain and a stenographer, sit in a dark room under a dome light around the table across which Underwood fell when he shot himself. Howard finally collapses and a signed confession is extorted from him. In police court he is held for the murder. Both scenes are strong. The accused man gives way and falls limp; he is boosted up and made to go on with the "confession." This happens repeatedly. Jeffries, Sr., not only refuses to befriend his son, but will not allow his lawyer, Brewster, to take the case.

Then Annie, the wife, gets in her good work. After repeated efforts and overcoming heart-breaking discouragements, she gains Brewster's ear. "I am not a criminal lawyer," he says. "My husband is not a criminal," she replies. Finally he is persuaded to undertake the defense.

Reconciliation Ends All

At the trial the scene is intense. Dr. Bernstein goes on the stand and rigorously confounds the testimony of the police captain. Annie, to save the name of the other woman, says she is the Mrs. Jeffries to whom Underwood addressed his letter. The police captain fights in vain to hold to his methods, but Howard is freed and he and his wife rush happy from the court room. Then the wife of Jeffries, Sr., rises to the occasion by confessing to her husband that it was she who visited Underwood. Jeffries, Sr., shows his high calibre by forgiving her, and a general reconciliation follows.

The whole picture maintains a high plane throughout. It has the weight of the Klein name and the success of the drama from which it is adapted. The adaption is excellent. The picture is one which, per se, is of great value. The sets and acting are good, the cast pleasing. In addition that good Lubin photography and excellent direction prevail. There is nothing more to say, nor is there any need to say more.

Crowds See "The Sea Wolf"

POLICE aid was called upon to handle crowds at the Imperial Theatre, San Francisco, on the occasion of the exhibition of Bosworth's seven-reel production of "The Sea Wolf." Films were running from 10 o'clock in the morning and took in seven thousand dollars the first six days. During the first two weeks of the exhibition an extra show was put on each night, and the last exhibition ended at 1 o'clock in the morning. They will be on exhibition there indefinitely.

"John Barleycorn," Bosworth's second production of the Jack London series, is now ready and will be released shortly. "John Barleycorn," by Jack London, created a tremendous sensation when it appeared as a serial story in the Saturday Evening Post, and will appear in book form simultaneously with the film production. This is a most unique production, being practically a life confession of the early struggles of the author with King Alcohol.

The difficult task of portraying the life and character of the author is cleverly depicted by three actors. Matty Roubert, the celebrated child actor, late of the Universal Company, portrays the character of Jack London as a child of six, showing how he first got drunk from his father's beer jug at that tender age. Antrom Short, an older boy actor, portrays the role of Jack London at the age of 16. Elmer Clifton, who has remarkable physical and facial resemblance to Jack London, has been chosen to characterize the author at the age of 30. Mr. London himself appears in the production.

In "John Barleycorn," London treats on the drink question in a manner never before shown, either in fiction or on the screen.

Following the "John Barleycorn" pictures, the Bosworth Company, which has a contract to produce all of London's works in motion pictures, will film "The Valley of the Moon," "Martin Eden," "Smoke Bellew," "Burning Daylight," "The Iron Heel," and others of the best and most widely known of this celebrated author's works.

PRODUCE FILMS AND VAUDEVILLE SKETCHES

The Gorman Film Manufacturing Company, Inc., 1402 Broadway, New York City, is named after Jack Gorman, the author, who is president and general manager. The company has a studio at Cliffside, N. J., and will produce feature films and sketches for vaudeville. They are negotiating with Giles Warren, formerly with the Whitman Warren Company, to act as director. They will shortly release a three-reel feature of Western life with entirely new effects.

Their second picture will be a three-reel feature, "A Girl of the Underworld," taken from the play of the same name, of which Mr. Gorman is the author. He has three companies on the road now.

KLEINE TO RELEASE AN AMBROSIO

"The Marriage of Figaro" is an Ambrosio two-reel subject which George Kleine schedules for release through the General Film Company as a regular two-reel release, Tuesday, February 3, 1914. This subject was selected by Mr. Kleine personally while in Europe, and is notable for some of the most magnificent settings available in Seville, Spain, where the drama was staged.

Several scenes show the royal castle "Alcazar" at Seville. The principal leads of the two-reel are the same whose work in Kleine's "The Last Days of Pompeii" has created so much favorable comment the world over.

RENFAX MUSICAL MOTION PICTURES

The Renfax musical pictures are to be released through the Renfax Film Company, Inc., 110 West Fortieth Street, New York City, of which Mr. Dewitt Fox is the president and Mr. A. J. Abram is the general manager. They have about twenty releases of musical motion pictures, the synchronism of all of which is perfect and the photography very good. The rates on these pictures are within the reach of every exhibitor, who will find them a good drawing card.

"I'LL GET YOU"

Scene from Renfax Musical Motion Pictures.

The Renfax Company have ten demonstrating companies en route at present. The company will be glad to furnish full detail to any exhibitor desiring same, regarding these singing and dancing movies of song hits.

KEYSTONE "COPS" CAUSE EXCITEMENT

Broadway, Los Angeles' most congested thoroughfare, was recently put at the disposal of the Keystone Company for the making of a picture entitled "His Sister's Kids." In the production the Keystone police were directed to make a chase down this thoroughfare at the busiest time of the day. The city traffic police mistook a fleeing player for an escaped lunatic and there was a genuine struggle in their attempts to capture him.

A large crowd gathered, and a bystander was about to turn in a riot call, when it was discovered that it was the Keystone Company at work. Meanwhile the Keystone police, coming at full speed, had a hazardous time of it threading their way through the traffic. One of them was hit by a street car, and two others had narrow escapes from being run down by autos.

FEATURES IDEAL REBOOKED

Mrs. Agnes Egan Cobby, manager of Features Ideal, of 227 West Forty-second Street, is in receipt of the following letter, of which she is very proud, from an exhibitor who showed the first Features Ideal subject, "The Guerrillas of Algiers":

"It affords me great pleasure to write to you that on December 14, 1913, I ran your three-reel Feature Ideal, 'The Guerrillas of Algiers.' Beg to advise you that we did the greatest volume of business on that day that has ever been done there before, having 4,800 paid admissions. The audiences were so immensely pleased by same that, owing to the repeated calls, I have booked same for a return date. In all my experiences as an exhibitor I have never received so many compliments from my patrons as I did upon running 'The Guerrillas of Algiers.'

"Sincerely trusting you will keep up the good work and give us more of the same kind, I remain,

"Very respectfully yours,
"Eighth Avenue Amusement Co.,
"E. H. Rauch."

TETRAZZINI POSES

Madame Luisa Tetrazzini fell a victim to the fascination of posing for motion pictures upon her recent arrival in New York on the Mauretania.

The cameras of "Our Mutual Girl," accompanied by the little lady herself and a number of her supporting company, were on the dock to receive the big liner and meet some of the notables among its passengers. Tetrazzini took a lively interest in the proceedings, and the result was several hundred feet of pictures showing the famous star being welcomed to America and her experience with the reporters and custom officials.

"SELLING OUT" IN SPAIN

BY ROBERT CARLTON BROWN

KING ALFONSO has to ride in motor cars and drink champagne, so the poor devils who work for twenty or forty cents a day have to pay. Somebody has to pay, and because the King is perfectly democratic he doesn't pick out one man or one class to pay his crown-maker's bills, he makes everybody pay.

The poor motion picture exhibitor in Spain has to come up with fifteen per cent. of his entrance money so the King can have pâté de foies gras and nightingales' tongues. It's fine for the King, but tough for the exhibitor.

Perhaps the heavy tax imposed on all theatre seats throughout Spain is the reason why the field is not better covered. A town of fifty thousand gets along with one picture show, and it feels very gay if it can support two.

Over every box office is hung a card bearing prices of admission. Translated into American, the sign reads like this:

Box for 5 people, $1.20, including Government tax of 18c.

Orchestra seat, 16c. Government tax, 2¾c. extra.

Balcony seat, 8c. Government tax, 1½c.

Balance of balcony, 6c. Government tax, 1c.

General admission, 5c. Government tax, 1c.

"Nigger Heaven," 2½c. Government tax, ½c.

There are hardly any new motion picture theatres in Spain. Most exhibitors lease an old theatre, big and barnlike, and charge the regular theatre prices of Spain, which are very low, the best seats selling for about 20 cents and the cheapest for 2½c. With such a house on an exhibitor's hands he has a puzzling question before him: How to fill it?

* * * *

THERE is practically no such thing as 'selling out" in Spain. An exhibitor is lucky if he fills the bleachers and sells one-tenth of his best seats at one performance a day. There are good days, however, which bring up the balance of the year. Like Italians, the Spaniards have a feast day frequently, and on those days the people expend themselves and go to the theatres. But the ones who are the chief patrons at the picture shows prefer to pay from two to five cents for their pleasure, and that kind of trade is obviously not highly desirable.

Another peculiarity of the Spaniards is the selection of one day in the week to do things right. Each theatre has one, or perhaps two popular nights, when everybody goes, and the house can stay dark for the rest of the week for all the Spaniards care.

A family party of five or six will pick out a Friday night to go to the picture show at the Café Imperial, let us say. They tell their friends what a good show they saw and suggest that their friends go next Friday night. The friends do, and after five or six years a custom is established. Everybody who is anybody in the Café Imperial class goes there on Friday night, but you couldn't tempt them into the place on any other night by any inducement. If you offered the best three-reel feature obtainable you'd play to an empty house until Friday night, when business would suddenly pick up and you'd have your house half full. In Spain that is called "the correinte thing." One big night a week for one show, and that's all.

Everything moves slowly in Spain, and the usual program begins at eight o'clock and lasts till twelve. It is wearisome and long drawn out, but that's the way the people like it. They'll sit through an hour of spotty French films that have been dumped into Spain at bargain prices, and then they'll look just as patiently and calmly at a big feature film from America which cost real money.

As a matter of fact, the picture show of Spain corresponds with the old-fashioned show of six or eight years ago in America, except that some of the more progressive places have Pathé's Weekly and American features. But this expenditure of money seems to be unnecessary; it doesn't draw much bigger crowds or attract much more attention than a modest outlay in worn-out films from the Continent. The people want time-worn "chase" pictures, where the nurse flirts with the cop and the baby carriage starts rolling downhill. They think that's awfully funny, and to make sure that the people get it the word "Comica" is usually flashed on the screen before the picture is shown. The Spaniards like trick pictures and funny love stories.

* * * *

IT is doubtful if a Spanish audience will want the higher class of film productions for a good many years to come. They are illiterate as a class, the majority of them can't read or write, and a film which needs words or titles to explain it is never well received, except in the very best houses. The few people who can read the titles repeat them out loud, and those who can't read don't like the picture because it shows up their ignorance. Something simple and predigested is just their speed.

A live American with a collection of undesirable left-overs of a vintage ten years back could doubtless take them to Spain and make a bunch of money out of them, but for the up-to-date manufacturer the field is still a virgin one, and is apt to remain so until the people quit going to cock-fights and bull-fights.

A good exchange could be established in Spain, however. At present the business is not organized, exhibitors get films where they can or subscribe to some inadequate service. There is really a good opening for the right exchange man, and a few manufacturers are beginning to realize it. After all, in spite of the Government tax, Spanish people like the theatre. They must have it, just the same as they must have wine and black cigarettes. As long as this demand exists, and there seem to be plenty of Spanish exhibitors willing to take a chance, the exchange man ought to have the field well covered.

Since time began it has been the custom here to have three or four short performances a night in the theatre, but the motion picture exhibitors seemed to think they weren't giving enough for the money, so they started the four-hour session. If pictureplays could be given on the same session scheme of the theatres they would be more money in it. Some exhibitors have tried this, but in a faint-hearted way, and they have included vaudeville acts, which helped eat up the profits.

Vaudeville as an adjunct to pictures is fairly popular and profitable here. The people like singing and dancing, and very good artists can be found at very low prices.

The house which makes the most money is one which gives four shows a night and includes vaudeville. Spaniards don't like the daytime, because the sun is so hot, so performances begin at eight o'clock and last much later than they do in America, and matinees are out of the question, except one on Sunday as late as four or five o'clock in the afternoon. The sessions last from an hour to an hour and a half, and the last one begins at 11:30 or midnight. Rent is low, and music wouldn't cost much if it wern't for the fact that the audience is accustomed to a whole orchestra even at a picture show and can't get along without it.

* * * *

THERE are very few local pictures shown. Perhaps if more films were manufactured in Spain, by the Spaniards and for the Spaniards, business would be on the boom. Pathé and Kleine-Cines both have stock companies in Spain, but most of the pictures taken are for foreign consumption. What is needed most is a film favorite or two for the masses. They have a confusion of actors and actresses from other countries, but no native player to interpret their feelings for them in pic-

Pathe Gets World's Fair Contract

PATHE FRERES have just been appointed official cinematographers of the Panama Pacific International Exposition, which will be held in San Francisco in 1915, to celebrate the completion of the Panama Canal. The contract was closed on December 5, and is now officially in effect.

It grants to Pathe Freres the sole right to make motion pictures in black and white, in colors, and also talking motion pictures within the Exposition grounds, from the date of signing the contract to and including thirty days after the Exposition closes.

Competition for this appointment, with its accompanying privileges, was most keen. Cash offers, ranging from $10,000 to $50,000, together with substantial royalties on the gross receipts, were offered the committee. Pathe Freres secured the concession without the payment of any cash bonus, the committee and exposition officials being convinced that none of the other bidders could give the Exposition the world-distribution for the pictures they were assured of receiving under the contract with Pathe.

Pathe Freres were represented throughout the negotiations by J. W. Binder, who spent six weeks in San Francisco. Mr. Binder is a specialist in business organization, who for nearly a year has been making a study of the motion picture art, with a view of developing its use along industrial, educational and commercial lines. As a direct outcome of the Pathe contract, Mr. Binder has set apart one day out of thirteen to be covered by the World Congress on Education which will commence in San Francisco in July, 1915. The entire day is to be devoted to a practical exposition of methods of applying the motion picture to educational work from the primary school to the university.

Mr. Binder will represent Pathe Freres at San Francisco working out the details of the contract. He leaves January 1.

TWO CAMERAS FOR "OUR MUTUAL GIRL"

In producing the "Our Mutual Girl" series, soon to be seen on the Mutual program, two cameras are used in the taking of every scene. This precaution not only lessens the risk of loss due to accident to the camera or film, but also allows extra care to be used in the developing of the exposed negative.

One roll of negative is developed in New York while the other is immediately sent to a Philadelphia factory.

The many important personages being photographed for the "Mutual Girl" series are extremely difficult to get to pose for motion pictures and if anything happened to mar the negative, once it was obtained, the chance of retaking the picture would be very small.

A print is made from each negative and the better one of the two selected for use in the picture. In addition to this advantage is the fact that one camera man usually obtains much better action than the other, because his position happens to be favorable.

STORM DELAYS ACTORS

Crane Wilbur and several other Pathe players under the direction of Frank Powell were held up recently for four days by storms which kept them from going over to Block Island by steamer from Newport. The water was so rough that the steamer was turned back twice. Powell's desire for Block Island backgrounds was considerably diminished after several severe attacks of sea sickness and everyone in the party was similarly affected.

EDWARD COXEN, OF THE "FLYING A" FILMS

Here's to you, O Edward Coxen,
For we like the things you do;
We all like your style of loving,
And we care a lot for you.

And we like the look appealing
That is seen within your eyes
When you play the part of hero,
With some sweet girl for the prize.

We all think you great as sheriff,
And you make a cowboy grand—
So here's health and luck to you, Ed:
Gee! I'd like to shake your hand!

EDWARD A. LIFKA.

TONS OF TURKEY

Two and a half tons of turkey, more than three hundred big birds, ordered from Maryland by the Vitagraph Company, were given away to their players and employees on the day before Christmas.

It was amusing to see the Vitagraph force leaving the studios the day before Christmas, each carrying a big turkey under his arm. This is usually known at the Vitagraph studios as "The Turkey Parade." This year it was called "The Turkey Trot."

One of the requirements relative to being in the "parade" is that everyone must carry their turkey home themselves. John Bunny, the most portly man at the studio, got the largest turkey, a prize bird weighing thirty pounds. Confirmed old bachelors had the privilege of taking the equivalent value of the turkey in money with which to buy themselves cigars or whatever else they needed.

OSHKOSH CONVENTION A SUCCESS

The biggest and best convention ever held in Wisconsin took place in Oshkosh on December 16 and 17, at the Athearn Hotel. Harmony and good fellowship prevailed throughout the convention.

President Neff opened the convention and was in the chair until just before the convention adjourned, when the following elected officers were installed:

National vice-president, John R. Ek, Oshkosh; president, Harry H. Buford, La Crosse; first vice-president, W. J. Judson, Portage; second vice-president, H. Z. Zander, Rhinelander; secretary, A. E. Gray, Oshkosh; treasurer, Neil Duffy, Appleton, and sergeant at arms, C. L. Hiller, Eau Claire.

Several feature film men were in attendance and one or two manufacturers and musical men. The Nicholas Power representative, as usual, showed pictures, and a new motion picture machine from Chicago was on exhibition.

The next convention will be held in Green Bay, Wisconsin, in the month of April. An organizer will be placed in the field immediately, under the instructions of the State president and secretary. The convention wound up with a big banquet.

"KING BRADY'S" AUTHOR WRITES FOR BLACHE

Herbert Blache, of Blache Features, has just completed a four-part feature entitled "Hook and Hand." This scenario was written by William Doughty, the author of the "Old King Brady" detective stories. Hook and Hand is a remarkable living character. He is at the present time serving a fifteen-year sentence in the Montana State Penitentiary. The incidents in the story woven around Hook and Hand are real facts from his very sensational career. The writer says that he is one of the most peculiar characters in the criminal world.

PICTURES AID SUFFRAGE

Two suffragette leaders, Miss Rose Windslow and Miss Helen Todd, carried the fight for woman suffrage into the motion picture theatres last week, when they spoke at Marcus Loew's Circle Theatre, where the suffrage picture, "What 80,000,000 Women Want," with Mrs. Pankhurst in the leading role, was shown. This picture, which was taken October 23 at the Chelsea studios on West Thirty-first street, was shown last Friday for the first time in public, and may go over the entire Marcus Loew circuit, in which event it would reach approximately 1,000,000 people.

The suffragettes plan to have speakers for the "cause" at every theatre where the picture is shown to speak to the audience after each showing of the film. The picture is in four reels.

LIFE OF QUEEN VICTORIA FILMED

A CAST of eight thousand people, of whom eight hundred appear in one scene; eight thousand two hundred costumes, of which many were specially designed; five months devoted to the writing of the scenario alone; one hundred thousand dollars expended in production—here are some reasons why the picture "Sixty Years a Queen" takes rank with the most remarkable ever made, and in many ways stands alone as a film masterpiece.

The well-known English producer, William Barker, delighted a large audience in the north ballroom of the Hotel Astor, New York, last Sunday afternoon, with the first exhibition of the picture in this country.

Mr. Barker explained, for the benefit of those present having a technical knowledge of projection, that the pictures,

THE GIVING OF THE FIRST VICTORIA CROSS

fifteen feet in size, were projected on only fifteen amperes of electric current. This was due, he said, to the use of a "Day and Night" screen. The projection was perfect—soft and clear. It was a triumph from a mechanical point of view as well as from the artistic.

Vigorous Search for "Types"

Later Mr. Barker talked interestingly of the picture and its making, in particular of how its wonderful realism was accomplished.

In all nine months were required to complete the picture—this by the energetic Mr. Barker, who says we produce too slowly in this country. Three writers spent five months on the scenario. A great deal of time; but it must be said that if such time is required to produce a picture so finished in every detail, so faithful in reproduction, then the time is assuredly well spent.

A good deal of delay was occasioned by the difficulty in securing characters. Over six hundred persons were interviewed for the leads. These were secured by liberal advertising in the British press, offering fifty dollars for twenty minutes' work.

In order to secure a character for the part of King Edward—who appears but once in the picture—the portrait of the late King was published in the "Daily Sketch" for eleven consecutive days. Four thousand replies were had, one from a woman who covered four pages of note-paper with proofs of her husband's likeness in every way to the King and closed by stating that unfortunately the subject was dead. Two hundred and fifty dollars were offered for this character for three minutes' work.

Three actresses depicted the life of Queen Victoria from young womanhood to old age. The small stature of the late Queen, her facial characteristics, and the high order of acting required made the selection of these characters extremely difficult. It proved impossible to find in England a young woman for the part and Mr. Barker had to go to Austria for her. She could not speak English and the excellent acting she does was the result of Mr. Barker's instructions through gestures.

The part of the middle-aged Queen was taken by Miss Heath and the elderly Queen by Mrs. Lytton, wife of the well-known English actor, Harry Lytton. In both instances, as well as with the young Queen, the utmost fidelity in appearance and queenly dignity was achieved.

Accuracy the Keynote

An idea of the fidelity of characterization throughout the picture may be had from the frontispiece illustration in this issue. Disraeli was splendid. The part of Lord Salisbury was taken by the well-known English novelist, Arthur Shirley. In this group the goatee of Disraeli and the side-whiskers of John Bright were the only make-up used. Not a single wig was used in the entire picture.

Charles Dickens was found by Mr. Barker one morning in the Bakerloo tube. And so he diligently acquired his characters. Many notables appeared with the request only that their identity remain unknown.

Accuracy was made the keynote of the picture. Hidebound facts must be observed. So Mr. Barker started his work by securing, through the Lord Chamberlain, access to all the engravings, paintings and other records in possession of the Royal family. Even some of these proved inaccurate in the light of the rigid investigation made. For instance, in the well-known painting by Sir David Wilkie of the Queen at her council meeting, the latter appears in a white dress. A white dress was made for the scene, only to be discarded, when there was found in the Queen's diary her own statement that she appeared in mourning.

The costuming was the most important undertaking of all. Eight thousand two hundred costumes, supplied by the London costumer, William Clarkson, were used. Most of these were original creations, perfected only after a deal of study in every instance. All the dresses in the jubilee of '87, with their odd bustles, panniers, and leg-of-mutton sleeves, had to be created.

In the Queen's diary she notes that her dress of gold at the coronation weighed over two hundred pounds and that she was unable to move without the aid of the pages. To secure the desired realism, Mr. Barker had built a dress of brass, weighing one hundred and fifty pounds, for use in this picture.

At the exhibition of the picture much favorable comment was caused by the realistic snow scene at the siege of Sebastopol, and many were curious to know how the effect was secured.

The snow flakes were shavings of kid gloves, which have the same specific gravity as real snow flakes and consequently the very same floating effect. They were scattered from three different boxes arranged at regular distances from the camera. In each box the shavings were of graded sizes, those nearest the camera being smallest and so on, the effect being that all appeared of the same size in the picture. The cost of the flakes was $55.

Immense Night Sky Scene

Another innovation in the Sebastopol scene was a night sky scene 105 feet wide by 85 feet high. This is the largest of its kind ever used.

Not a scrap of painted scenery was used in the picture. Every ornament was real. The pillars in the Westminster Abbey scene cost $1,000 to make. The gun at Ladysmith cost one hundred and fifty dollars.

Mr. Barker is most insistent upon his policy of realistic settings—in all pictures. He burns his settings once they are used. They are valueless afterward, he claims. "Every show should stand upon its own bottom," to use his phrase.

The film itself, which is about 7,000 feet long, is divided into four reels, three long and one short. Part One shows the Queen from her accession to the throne to her marriage to Prince Albert of Saxe-Gotha. It opens with death of King William. Then the Princess is notified that she is to be England's Queen. Coronation scenes follow in great detail and of great historical accuracy and value. Scenes are shown of the celebration all over the British Empire. The Queen and Prince Albert are betrothed. She indicates her choice by presenting him with a flower at a public dance.

Albert, at a loss as to what to do with the posy, takes a knife, skewers a hole in his lapel and inserts the flower. This was the first boutonniere and the first buttonhole in the lapel of a man's coat, a custom which endures to this day.

In Part Two are shown many scenes concerning the Crimean War, the siege of Sebastopol, the death of the Prince Consort, the mourning for him and other items of interest such as the delivery of the first letter with an adhesive stamp, the sending of the first trans-Atlantic cablegram by the Queen, of President Lincoln, and Charles Dickens in his study, with the characters he created visualized through very fine double exposure.

Incidentally the reception of the cablegram by Lincoln is the only disappointing scene in the whole production. Lincoln, himself, falls far below the popular conception of him in this country.

Of Great Educational Value

In Part Three were shown many Indian scenes and historic events. The marriage of Prince Edward, which the Queen did not sanction by her presence, being one of the interesting events.

Part Four, the short reel, shows the last days and death of the Queen. The close is a bust of the Queen, at the base of which persons of all classes lay their tributes to the good Victoria.

"Sixty Years a Queen" shows a master hand in every element of production. As an educational picture it has no equal. It should have a large audience in this country for this reason alone and for its inherent excellence. In Canada it should prove, for patriotic interest, the most popular picture ever shown there. W. THE MOTION PICTURE IN GREECE

THE motion picture, so popular in the Orient, has not yet enjoyed in Greece the same success that it has had in Turkey and Egypt. Very badly exploited since its inception about six years ago, it does not yet possess a single establishment specially adapted for its performance according to a bulletin issued by the French Chamber of Commerce in Greece. These performances are given here and there all over the country, in summer the theatres being without roofs, which are hurriedly and badly transformed into winter theatres when the season changes.

The public, spoiled during the summer by free open-air performances, becomes difficult to please, and, in order to make up programs, which their patrons demand shall be changed daily, exhibitors are obliged to mix with their new films a very large quantity of old films which bring discredit upon the theatres.

Latterly, however, some of the big manufacturing firms have opened agencies in Greece. These are tending to better the conditions, and, by limiting programs to new films only, will finish by giving the motion picture new scope, which promises well for its future.

FRENCH films are by far the most popular, although American films are not despised. Public taste is more especially drawn towards tragic plays, highly colored melodramas, stories of the police and criminals, and also "comics."

There being no actual sale for films, hiring business only is done. The films are supplied by the big Paris houses which have an agency at Athens.

The total import of films is more than 984,000 feet (300,000 metres) a year, but films only circulate for a short while in the country, and are returned immediately after they have been used. In spite of this, duty has to be paid, and is not returnable when the goods leave the country again, as is the case in Egypt.

Films, new or old without distinction, are assessed by weight at the Customs: 5 francs 80 centimes, the oke (1,252 grammes), while the toll fees and other formalities bring the charge to about 4½ centimes the metre (about one cent per 3 feet). Besides this, toll is exacted upon the films at each town they enter.

UNFORTUNATELY the manner in which the toll fees, and also the harbor dues, are levied in Greece, left as they are to the judgment of agents who have no properly established basis to act upon, very much augments the expenses of exhibitors, and, in consequence, does much to retard the spread of the motion picture in the rural districts.

A Corfu business man, for instance, taking his programs to Athens, pays an amount equal to nearly 50 per cent of the hiring charges in fees and duties.

The sale of projectors and general apparatus is as small as that of films. When an outfit is imported, the duty of 5 francs 80 centimes per oke is sometimes levied on the projector alone, and sometimes on the complete outfit. Thus, the amount of duty one pays on material worth 800 francs may be anything from 100 to 400 francs (from $20 to $80) according to the humor in which the assessor of duty may be on the day of entry. Most of the big towns have electricity. In others, generating sets supply the current.

THERE exists one firm of film manufacturers in Greece—the "Fabrisque Panhellénique de films S. Léonce," at Athens. Up to now, it is true, this firm has produced only topical and scenic pictures, but it announces its intention of issuing in the near future some spectacular plays, which should certainly be successful in view of the natural beauties and historical monuments which abound in the land.

Altogether, although Greece has not yet progressed very far in the motion picture field, one can foresee that the spirit of imitation which dominates the Greeks, and their love of everything connected with the theatre, will bring about a rapid extension and development of the picture industry in their country.

OH, IT'S AN INTERESTING LIFE!

Punctuated by GEORGE D. PROCTOR

SURVEYING the week with the cold, judicial air of that well-known institution, the cash register, it would seem that old Father Time is soon to ring up another year. The glad Yule-tide has come and gone. Others have dilated on that fact by and large. Now a brand new chunk of Time, 365 days strong, confronts the motion picture business.

Time is indeed golden and endowed with wings in this industry. Fortunes are being made quicker in the motion picture business than in any other legitimate occupation. Lose but a little time and some unsleeping competitor may beat you to the golden opportunity. Little more than a year ago the man would have been considered a hopeless optimist who would have said that motion pictures would have made the strides they have. Who would have been brave enough to predict pictures actually crowding the legitimate right in Times Square, the few feet of earth that make the theatrical center of the country. But pictures now are crowding the legit and the legit is moving over to make room for 'em.

Take the most optimistic prediction which sounds reasonable for the coming year and add fifty per cent. That is my idea of what pictures will do in the next twelve months.

The way in which the industry is progressing even the less meritorious firms are going to get by with profits comparatively large. But the people who deserve the credit and the money, and who often get both, the Rollo books notwithstanding, are the people who are crowding every nerve to aid and uplift. They are the people who are making good pictures, the folks who are conducting their business on sound principles, the folks who do not connive at trash, but steadily aim at all that is highest and best. More power to 'em. All of which may be construed as a clumsy way of saying "Happy New Year."

A combine has been made by the theatrical firm of Cohan and Harris and the Kinemacolor Company of America. Cohan and Harris will furnish the plays and the theatres. They will put pictures next summer in the houses they control, using black and white as well as color pictures. This deal was put through, it is understood, after Cohan and Harris had dickered unsuccessfully with several other motion picture firms.

Echoes drifting in from Ohio show that the censors there are having trouble among themselves. J. A. Maddox, chairman of the censors, handed in his resignation last Saturday to the Industrial Board. No reason is given out, a fact significant in itself. Mr. Maddox has been in the motion picture business in Columbus so he may return to his place. His successor has not yet been appointed.

With his face bearing the tan of sunny Florida, Frank V. Beal strode into our town recently. Frank was down where the breezes blow soft and sensuous, producing pictures for Tampa Films, Inc., but returned to see the festivities attendant upon the exhibition of the picture he produced, "The Inside of the White Slave Traffic." Frank, by the way, was formerly head producer with the Selig Polyscope Company, so he acknowledges.

The Vitagraph Company of America announces that soon after the first of the year a big Times Square theatre will be opened as the Vitagraph Theatre. Most likely the Criterion, as rumor has been very strong concerning this deal for some time. Here will be shown the big Vitagraph features, of five or more reels, now being produced, before their general release.

The Vitagraph Company, it dawned upon me some time ago, has hit upon the ideal method of procedure—to produce big pictures and own its own chain of theatres. I understand that, if this present deal is successful, the Vitagraph company will have a chain of say, sixty, theatres within six months. The pictures will be known as "Broadway Star Features."

Incidentally Vitagraph will soon put out a new brand of comedies.

Charles Feature Abrams, who has been selling Great Northern Special Features since the flood, took his pencil in hand the other day and computed that he has sold more than 5,400,000 feet of film. Incidentally, Charlie gave away nice little gold pieces for Christmas presents to all his employees.

Chester Beecroft, press agent and advertising manager for the General Film Company, is in Chicago on a business trip.

Joe Brandt, the peerless press agent of the Universal, has returned from Europe. Mr. Exhibitor, take note.

Taking testimony in the suit of P. A. Powers against the Universal Film Manufacturing Company and Carl Laemmle, involving the Horsley stock, has been continued till January 6. On that day hearings will be held before Referee Morgan J. G. O'Brien at 2 Rector street.

Maurice B. Seltzer has just taken charge of the advertising department of the American Theatre Curtain and Supply Company, manufacturers of Radium Gold Fibre screens. He was formerly connected with the S. H. Rosenheim advertising agency of St. Louis.

The George W. Dillingham Publishing Company has closed a contract with the Universal Film Manufacturing Company to produce "Traffic in Souls" in book form. Eustace Hale Ball, Marathon novelist, short story and scenario writer, will write the book.

Albert Blinkhorn gave all his little playmates in his office a "Christmas box" on the twenty-fifth. This is English for an extra week's salary.

The souvenir program to be auctioned at the Screen Club ball should sell for a handsome sum this year. Kessel and Bauman have already started the fun with a bid of $1,000.

the amount they paid last year. This action is a challenge to other manufacturers. Here's hoping the bidding is spirited.

Leading the list of recent social events is the ball tendered D. W. Griffith, head producer for the Mutual Film Corporation, at Murray's last Saturday. The affair was attended by a crowd culled carefully from the Mutual and Biograph, with which Griffith was connected so long. The feature was the presentation of an evening set of platinum and pearl cuff buttons and studs by Dell Henderson. Mr. Griffith made a short speech of acceptance. Mr. Miller and "Spike" Robinson also made speeches.

Among those present were Vera Gordon, Gertrude Robinson, Norma Phillips, Consuelo Bailey, Blanche Sweet, Mae Marsh, Lillian Gish, Mr. and Mrs. Will Louis, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Lewis, Harris Gordon, Alan Hale, James Kirkwood, Henry Walthall, Eddie Dillon, Jack Dillon, Earl Fox, Walter Stanhope, Fred Aiken and Jack Barrymore.

The engagement is announced of Stephanie Le Tang and Raymond Hoadley, of the Universal forces.

Clarkson P. Ryttenber, of the Ryno Film Company, has imported a "white slave" picture which he calls "Shackled Souls" or "In the Clutches of the White Slave Traders." American rights have already been sold to Al Levy.

The Manhattan Feature Film Company, of 341 Fifth avenue, has opened a branch office in Troy.

G. D. Briggs, Jr., succeeds Ben Abrams, as manager of the Philadelphia office of Warner's Features, Inc. Mr. Briggs has conducted exchanges in Springfield, Mass., and Albany, N. Y.

C. Lang Cobb, manager of sales and publicity for Ramo films, is off on another trip, this time for two weeks. He will open offices in Minneapolis, St. Louis and Indianapolis to handle Ramo films and also expects to close a standing order for Ohio and several other big contracts.

One simply is compelled to hand it to Arthur Leslie as a "stunt man." His latest was to send around Christmas stockings containing newspaper clippings about the recipient. Most timely, apropos, and all that.

Have seen a neat little pocket-size catalogue from the H. W. Johns-Manville Company, of New York, manufacturers of asbestos goods. The title of this booklet is "Theatre Necessities." It deals principally with asbestos theatre curtains, operating booths and fire extinguishers. The booklet is a very neat little affair, well printed in two colors on heavy enameled stock and with embossed cover. It is profusely illustrated with half tones of the goods, for which the sizes and prices are fully given.

After months of preparation the first picture of "Our Mutual Girl," the fifty-two reel serial, will be released by the Mutual Film Corporation on Monday, January 5.

FIRST BETTY NANSEN PICTURE A TREAT

Distinguished Tragedienne Stamps First of Great Northern Preferred Feature Attractions with Own Personality, Making "Princess Elena's Prisoner" a Notable Drama

WITH Miss Betty Nansen, the distinguished tragedienne, playing the leading role in this absorbing four-reel drama, the Great Northern Film Company is to be congratulated upon bringing the photo-drama closer in touch with the stage. The Nansen series—there are several of them announced to follow as the Great Northern Preferred Feature Attractions—judging by the first, promises a treat for lovers of the artistic as produced on the film.

THE PRIME MINISTER

Miss Nansen proves herself to be an actress of exceptional ability, and while there are those who may suggest that in the earlier moments she does not infuse more animation into the role, it remains to be seen at the conclusion of the story that her conception of the part is all that could be wished for. She has a thorough grasp of the requirements of the role of the Princess Elena, and her demeanor and histrionic ability serve to make the production one of the noteworthy photo-dramatic creations of the era.

The story is simple enough in the concrete, but with Miss Nansen playing the leading role, the theme becomes powerful from the tragical point of view. The actress possesses an appealing personality on the screen, and in truth she lives up to the reputation which she has earned on the stages of the principal theatres of Europe. Now for a digest of the story which affords Miss Nansen her opportunity.

She is the Princess Elena, and her father is a king who is bent upon making war upon his neighbors. Before hostilities have been resumed for the latest outbreak, the Princess meets Captain Versin, who belongs to the hostile country, and she learns to love him. There is a dinner being given in the old castle, and the Prime Minister announces with pride that the armies of the King have won another victory over the enemy. The company is elated, all but Princess Elena, who recalls having met and loved Captain Versin during times of peace. When the prisoners of war are brought in, Miss Nansen supplies an excellent bit of acting as she sees the man of her choice taken to the hospital on an army cot. She orders him taken to the castle after nursing him back to health, and in the meantime the Prime Minister is looking on with jealous eyes. She aids him to escape but he is recaptured.

The Captain proves himself a craven and pleads that he be given another opportunity to escape, and the Princess appropriates the uniform of one of the guards and permits Versin to escape. He has many exciting moments, but in the meantime the Princess Elena, realizing that her love has been misplaced, uses the stiletto on her wrist, and when the Prime Minister arrives in order to carry out the sentence imposed upon Captain Versin, he finds the Princess dead on the floor of the cell.

Miss Nansen is seen to excellent advantage in the role of Princess Elena, and her supporting company gives evidence that the directorship was handled most carefully. The entire story is one that requires the most careful attention in the way of ensemble, and the appearances of Miss Nansen in the screen picture lend a dignity and appeal that is calculated to win its way to the hearts of lovers of genuine photo-dramatic productions.

WHAT IS A MOTION PICTURE?

OF the scores of thousands of exhibitors who show motion pictures in their theatres in all parts of the world, probably few could reply to the question at the head of this article so clearly that the answer would be understood by a schoolboy. It is our object to make plain what the motion picture really is—that is, of what it is made, and this quite outside of the story, the acting, the settings that make the play or subject which the picture illustrates. We think that the exhibitor would find it of use to him, if he would master this information for himself and make it known to his audiences, as there is a widespread desire for such knowledge. This we know from what is said to us by many exhibitors and members of the public interested in the motion picture.

In technical language, a motion picture is a film of perforated celluloid, upon which is superimposed a positive silver image in pure gelatine. Say this to an ordinary exhibitor or a member of the public and he would reasonably ask:

What is celluloid?

What do you mean by superimposition?

What is a positive silver image in gelatine?

The answers to these questions will, we think, make our explanation clear to all. Until about twenty-five years ago, all photographs were taken on glass and then printed on paper. But amateur photographers, travelers and others complained of the weight of a number of glass plates, which they had to carry. So experiments were made to provide a light substitute for the glass—a substance that you could roll, that was flexible like paper or leather, that was lighter than glass and from which you could make your prints with the same ease that you could from glass. This substitute was found and it proved to be what is now known as celluloid. Anybody who uses a Kodak Camera to-day is using the substitute for glass that was then sought.

BEFORE the motion picture, as we see it to-day, could be made, it was necessary to have a flexible support and that flexible support is celluloid. Thus as a matter of historical fact the Kodak system of photography with celluloid and the making of motion pictures on celluloid were perfected about the same time. So you may say it was this celluloid which made photography so popular and the motion picture popular. In Kodak photography you roll your film around a spool, in motion picture photography you do practically the same, you wind it around a reel, either in the camera or in the machine that shows it on the screen.

Now, what is celluloid? The base of it, the substance out of which it is made is known in general terms as cellulose, which is a combination of little cells of a white papery looking substance, which is extracted from the wood of trees or plants. Ordinary cotton is really one form of cellulose. Absorbent cotton, or cotton wool, as it is sometimes called, is one form of cellulose.

Imagine a mass of white, fluffy, pure, absorbent cotton, then you will get an idea of the first and most important ingredient that enters into the making of celluloid.

This mass of pure white cellulose is mixed with nitric acid and sulphuric acid, two powerful liquids, which will remove the skin from your fingers, if you are careless in handling them. They are known as corrosive acids; they dissolve some metals and other hard substances easily. They are used in making explosive compounds. The result of mixing your cellulose with these strong acids is to form an explosive mixture known as gun-cotton. When this nitrated cotton, as it is also called, is dried and you take a little of it and light it or throw it into the fire, you will see that it burns or explodes quickly. This substance is known to be the base of many explosive compounds.

HAVING obtained this gun-cotton, the next step in the preparation of celluloid is to dissolve it, and make a liquid of it. This is done by means of a mix-

"THE VICAR OF WAKEFIELD"

Hepworth

WITH the exception of a few scenes which the subtitles in the print shown did not sufficiently explain, the "Vicar of Wakefield," the latest three-part Hepworth feature drama, to be presented in America by Albert Blinkhorn, 110 West Fortieth street, New York City, is a production of unusual excellence. Based on the famous story by Oliver Goldsmith, although greatly modified to meet the limits of the film, the presentation should prove popular. The photography is excellent, the acting of the best, and the action, staged as it is on scenes similar to those portrayed in Gildsmith's masterpiece, is of a character that holds the interest during most of the film.

THE MOCK MARRIAGE

In one or two respects, however, the direction of the piece invites criticism. Several scenes are not clearly explained. For instance, it is not demonstrated why Jenkinson, the manservant of the wicked Richard Thornhill, and the clergyman who performed the mock-marriage, which turns out to be real, happen to be in jail with the Vicar. The reason for Sir William Thornhill's presence there also, is not fully made plain. Just why the two dissolute female companions of Richand Thornhill are dragged into the action, for the sole purpose apparently of extending an invitation to the Vicar's daughters to come to London, a trip which never takes place, and is quite unessential to the development of the story as produced, is another point that is not quite clear, unless it is an excuse to bring in the scene at "Ye Olde English Fair."

THE theme of the production deales with the attentions of the dissipated Richard Thornhill, nephew of Sir William Thornhill, to the pretty daughters of the Vicar, Olivia and Sophia. Suspecting his nephew's designs, Sir William Thornhill disguises himself and after meeting the Vicar's family overhears a conversation which confirms his suspicions. The scenes which ensue in the first part show Richard trying to get Olivia, with whom he is infatuated, and her sister to arrange to go to London with him, at the invitation of two dissolute women, whose aid he has obtained. Moses, the weak-minded son of the Vicar, is sent by the family to the fair to sell their colt in order to obtain funds to finance the trip to London. He returns without money, having traded the colt for a stock of green spectacles.

This part is really a digression from the progress of the plot and in no way adds to it, especially as the audience is given no intimation previously of Moses' mental limitations. From this point forward, however, the action is excellent, and there is little which could be elided without detracting from the development of the story.

Failing to persuade the Vicar's daughters to go to London, Richard Thornhill finally gains Olivia's consent to run away with him. He plans a mock marriage, but through the enmity of Jenkinson, his body-servant, it is made a genuine ceremony. Later, tiring of Olivia, he tells her their wedding was not binding. She flees from him and is found by the Vicar, her father, at an inn, where she has sought refuge.

RICHARD THORNHILL, repenting of his haste in casting Olivia off, seeks her again at her father's house, which is owned by him. When his demands are scorned he throws the Vicar into prison as a debtor. Here the Vicar meets Jenkinson and the clergyman who had performed the marriage between Olivia and Thornhill, and wins their friendship.

The Vicar's family go to see him, and Jenkinson, recognizing Olivia, becomes remorseful. Richard also visits the prison to taunt the old man. His uncle, Sir William, who has come to aid the Vicar, encounters him. He reproaches his nephew for his conduct to his wife, and is told that Olivia is not a wife, as the ceremony was a mock one.

His statement is confuted by Jenkinson, who produces the marriage certificate and the clergyman who performed the ceremony, greatly to the confusion of Richard Thornhill.

Sir William, after paying the debt for which the Vicar is being detained, escorts the venerable parson and his family back home, where all is again peace and happiness.

The Hepworth stock company, which produced the "Vicar of Wakefield" in able fashion, includes Warwick Buckland, Harry Gilbey, Harry Buss, Jack Raymond, Marie De Solla, Chrissie White, Ruby Belasco and Claire Pridelle.

IMPROVEMENTS AT SOLAX PLANT

This photo shows the Solax plant in the process of expansion. The building in the background is the old plant, 150 x 150, three and one-half stories high. The studio accommodates five sets in a row.

The present factory has an equipment sufficient to turn out 100,000 feet of positive film a week. The frame-work to the right in an outdoor stage used for light effect purposes.

The new two-story building in process of construction is on the left, size 50 x 100, and in it will be housed the factory and laboratory to be removed from the main building. The added facilities will make it possible to turn out about 200,000 feet of positive film in a week.

The space in the foreground which is also the property of the Solax and Blaché companies will be improved and fenced in by ornamented iron railings.

"FLYING A" HISTORICAL SUBJECT

Players of the American Film Manufacturing Company, under direction of Lorimer Johnston, have finished a two-reel subject under the title "The Coming of the Padres," reproducing the founding of the Santa Barbara Mission by Padre Junipero Serre. The principal role will be played by Sydney Ayres. The production will not be an exclusively religious one, but will introduce much interest of early California life.

The Ernemann Film Printer

ONE of the most up-to-date devices for printing motion picture films from the negative is now on exhibition at the newly opened branch of the Ernemann Company, at 114 Fifth Avenue, New York City. It is the Ernemann "Imperatrix" printing machine, one of the most highly scientific instruments ever placed on the market. In point of workmanship this latest product of German craftsmanship, which is famous the world over, is a veritable marvel. In every respect it is the last word in devices of this character, being especially notable for the nicety of its adjustments for obtaining the highest point of accuracy.

In its general appearance the machine resembles other instruments designed for a similar purpose, but an examination quickly reveals the superior material used in its manufacture. Every one of its component parts is practically perfect, both in workmanship and in composition.

A "finger feed" with an absolutely straight downward pull constitutes its action, which is obtained by a cam that works the pinion rack first outward horizontally, then vertically downward and inward again horizontally. As to the pinion rack itself, it is a solid piece of steel, sliding in a dovetail slot with no possible chance of variance or vibration. The pins, or fingers, are screwed into this rack and may be readily changed when worn.

The motor has eight different speeds, which are regulated by a lever at the upper right. Another lever, on the upper left, controls eight different light intensities. The motor is driven from an ordinary incandescent socket and has two separate hand cut-offs which stop the printer mechanism, but not the motor. In addition to this the mechanism is so arranged as to stop itself automatically in the event that anything goes wrong. A belt connects the motor and the mechanism.

Bronze steel has been used in constructing the main face-plate of the printer, and this is reinforced by a rear plate of thick cast iron. This portion of the machine is constructed quite heavily, with the object of reducing vibration. Silver steel with phosphor bronze bearings is the material of which the working mechanism is constructed throughout. The tension device at the aperture plate is automatic and of the variety in use in most of the best film printers. The aperture is regulated at will while the machine is in operation. An automatic counting machine in front records every image as it is exposed.

A teakwood frame, which sets on four substantial legs, supports the mechanism. Unlike many other printers, there is no take-up in the Ernemann "Imperatrix," this having been dispensed with for the reason that film is often scratched by the use of a take-up. A film-box on rollers, which fills the place of a take-up, sets beneath the cabinet. It is divided into two compartments, one for the positive and one for the negative. The compartment for the former is light-tight and may be exposed in the daylight, while on the way to the developing-rooms, without injury to the film.

ture of ether and alcohol, two liquids much in use in the arts and sciences. Everybody has an idea of what these spirit-like liquids are. The cotton dissolved in these fluids makes a viscous body, heavier than water and like a light oil. It has a familiar, pungent odor which everybody who has been under the hands of a doctor or druggist will recognize. This liquid is called collodion. You can spread it out on glass and it will form a thin transparent coating. It is used in photography and for medical and other purposes.

We are now getting near to the actual base of the celluloid film. This liquid, when commercially prepared and poured out upon glass plates, will dry and form a thin, transparent film. But it is not strong; it will readily break and so it is necessary to make it tough enough for photographic and motion-picture work as the film has to undergo a great deal of wear and tear. So a hardening substance or substances are added to it—one of the latter is the familiar camphor. By adding camphor to the collodion, spreading it out upon glass plates or slabs, you get your celluloid film in large sheets, which is cut into the ribbons or films that are used in making motion pictures.

This celluloid is inflammable. It lights or takes fire readily because it has in its constitution substances that burn readily, the gun-cotton and the alcohol. Celluloid films which do not burn and are known as non-flam are made but so far have not been a success in practice, because while you make your celluloid non-inflammable, or non-burning, you also make it less easy to handle in the projection machine. It does not last so long. It is not necessary for us to go into the chemical explanation of this, because this is not a chemical article.

THE actual picture consists of silver—it is called pigmentary silver. Although it is black and has not the white shiny luster that we usually associate with silver; it is, nevertheless, of the same nature. That it is black is due to the fact that the picture was produced by the chemical action of light on silver, which is incorporated in the gelatine that is coated on the celluloid.

How does light act in making the picture? Simply in this way—it was discovered years ago that salts of silver, such as chloride of silver, bromide of silver and iodide of silver were affected by light, and that if you applied a suitable chemical to them they were made actually black instead of being roughly of a cream color. These salts of silver are so sensitive to light that you have to make them in the dark and you can only expose them in a camera, otherwise they would blacken all over—just as a silver spoon does if you leave it long in the atmosphere. Everybody knows that silver blackens or darkens in light and has to be constantly polished.

The gelatine fulfills the office of carrying the silver salt in suspension. You make a mixture (or emulsion) of gelatine nitrate of silver and bromide of potassium. The two salts mixed form another compound which is white bromide of silver. The other salts so formed are washed away.

All this is done in the dark and the celluloid is coated in the dark with the gelatine and bromide of silver in it. The film can only be exposed in a dark camera through a lens. When it is exposed it is developed in a dark room. Development consists in making the action of the light stronger. It darkens the part of the film that has been acted upon by the light. The part of the silver that has not been acted upon by light is dissolved out of the film by a salt of soda. Then the film is washed and dried, and you have what has been described in the earlier part of this article as a celluloid film carrying a positive image of metallic silver in clear gelatine.

This substantially is a motion picture: Celluloid, gelatine, silver.

GOLD MEDAL AWARDED

More than seven million people daily attend motion picture theatres, it is estimated. This fact brings to mind what an enormous task it is and has been to safeguard their lives. This is principally attained by means of proper and sufficient safety devices on the projecting machines, and it is interesting to note that a gold medal has just been awarded to the Nicholas Power Company, manufacturers of Power's Cameragraph No. 6-A, by the American Museum of Safety, under whose auspices the First International Exposition of Safety and Sanitation was held at the Grand Central Palace, New York City, December 11 to 20, inclusive.

This distinguished tribute to the mechanical genius and untiring efforts of Mr. Nicholas Power has been the occasion of much rejoicing by those who have been bending their energies to uplift the motion picture art, especially with regard to the prevention of fire and accident, and Mr. Power has been heartily congratulated.

TO FILM MEXICAN WAR

Thomas H. Ince, vice-president and director-general of the New York Motion Picture Corporation, recently detached from his working staff in Los Angeles, Cal., a number of intrepid camera men to take motion pictures of the Mexican war. The pictures taken will be brought and first shown to President Wilson, his cabinet and Congress before they are sent out for release.

Six motion picture men will journey to Jaurez, Mexico, where they will be joined by two others already on the scene. Then some of the party will join the Constitutionalist Army, and another coterie will push on toward Mexico City, for the purpose of entering the city and taking motion pictures of scenes of strife there.

The camera men's equipment includes a portable dark room, extra lenses, rations, and other supplies sufficient to last several weeks.

AN APPRECIATIVE LETTER

Clarence J. Harris, Oklahoma City, Okla., wrote the scenario of "The Trail of the Lost Chord," a recent two-reel production of the American Film Manufacturing Company, which met with universal approval and is still drawing full houses. When the picture was run in an Oklahoma house Mr. Harris was so well pleased with the production that he wrote at considerable length to Ed Coxen, who played the lead. The first paragraph reads as follows:

"Permit me to express to you my sincerest appreciation for your masterly and artistic work in my drama, 'The Trail of the Lost Chord.' Naturally, I went to the theatre with no little anxiety and expectancy. To say I was charmed with your work is slightly expressing it; the drama and its lesson depended on you; it all lay with you, and you lifted it to most exalted altitudes and gave to it such a stamp of your own personality that it thrilled me as I felt the strength of your high ideals and magnificent individuality."

The letter is much appreciated by Mr. Coxen.

SPECIAL FILM REVIEWS

"Over Niagara Falls." (Sterling Camera and Film Company. Four reels.)—Though newcomers, comparatively, in the producing line, the Sterling Camera and Film Company are here to stay. The fact is emphasized by this four-reel drama. Although melodramatic in character, with plenty of hairbreadth escapes, there is not a sign of anything throughout that could be construed as obnoxious or disagreeable even to the most sensitive minds. Good direction in every scene, the avoidance of anything inconsistent with a clever story, and capable acting will get this picture "over" with any audience.

Tom Wright and his cousin, Bob Farrell, go to college together. Bob is expelled for gambling and on his way home meets an unscrupulous lawyer, who engages him to smuggle in Chinamen. The method used is rather original. Tom, in the interim, has graduated, a full-fledged doctor. While in an automobile he runs over a woman, whom he carries to her home—a gambling house. While there the house is raided, and a policeman is shot. The blame falls on Tom. He is sentenced to twenty years at hard labor.

King, a Secret Service detective, is watching some men, in an attempt to catch them smuggling. There are some excellent fights, one man being thrown off a high roof. And then comes the thrill of the production. An automobile containing the lawyer is actually hit by an express train and smashed to pieces. Tom's sister is caught by the thieves, and after being placed in a barrel, is sent over the falls. Bob is killed and his body floats over the falls, after a desperate hand-to-hand encounter with King. Bob's previous confession vindicates Tom of all blame for the murder of the policeman.

Among the players who deserve credit in the production were James Alling, Augustus Collette, John Mahony, Arthur Donaldson and Violet Stewart.

A. D. M.

"Miracle Mary." (Victor. Two parts. Dec. 26.)—An excellent Christmas release which incidentally extolls one of the virtues of the motion picture. Glenn White and Fritzi Brunette, the principals, play with their usual talent. The story is not allowed to become at all conventional at any time. A very commendable picture for this season.

"Miracle" Mary, a member of the Salvation Army, is called upon to testify at the trial of an alleged burglar, whom she had known for some time. She tells his past history and how good a record he has had since his release from prison, but despite this the man is sentenced and sent to prison. The testimony of the various characters in the court scene are shown as they talk, in fade-away scenes making it more realistic. A good vision of the manger in Bethlehem with the Virgin and the Christ Child is also shown with good effect.

Christmas day in the prison arrives, and the kind warden and his helpers have arranged for an entertainment for the prisoners. It is during this performance that the innocence of the boy is proven. A motion picture film is projected on the screen showing him at some aeroplane races. He is freed when the reel is proven to be genuine. After his release he becomes a member of the Salvation Army, with his affianced wife, "Miracle" Mary.

"The Blind Power." (Lubin. Dec. 20. Three reels. General Film Company Exclusive Service.)—Somewhat similar to "The Evil Eye," released some time ago by the same company. This story deals with mental suggestion and is appropriately termed a "mystery story." Romaine Fielding plays the lead and deserves commendation. He has the power in the story to absorb anything he wishes, through his tremendous will power.

He goes blind, and takes away the sight of his nephew that he may see; he steal's his sister's wonderful brain that he may write; he steals an inventor's mind that he may become famous, and then he meets the girl he learns to love, and rather than steal her voice, he commits suicide in a spectacular manner. In places it is as creepy as though from the pen of Edgar Allen Poe.

"Uncle Tom's Cabin." (Kalem. Two parts. Dec. 17.)—There is a possibility that there is no one, even in the most rural sections of this country, who has not seen this beautiful dramatization of the work of Harriet Beecher Stowe. But there are many who have not seen it since childhood, and to these this production of the Kalem company will appeal strongly. To children it will be a boon. This is the second time it has been produced in the pictures, but this attempt is far more perfect than the first, and is accurate in every detail.

There are summer and winter scenes, the action covering a considerable length of time. There was no attempt to try to equal the death scenes as represented in the original drama. That would have been impossible without the voice, and so they were but lightly touched upon. In this way there was no chance of making an unfavorable comparison. The escape of Eliza, on the other hand, was much more realistic than the speaking drama because of the facility of real floating ice, a real river, real dogs, etc. But the most wonderful piece of work in the whole production is the fateful death of Legree at the conclusion. This was wonderfully portrayed.

THE FILM PROVES HIS INNOCENCE
Scene from "Miracle Mary." (Victor—2 reels.)

"Within the Enemy's Lines." (Edison. Two reels. Dec. 19.)—From the story, "A Captured Santa Claus," by Thomas Nelson Page. An excellent offering, which is sure to "get across." The story is of the Civil War, and vividly describes the heroism of a man who, in disguise, manages to get to his home for Christmas to bring the children their toys. He is known to be in his house, and his little son, knowing that he will be hanged if caught without a uniform, goes after one. Although shot he saves his father's life.

The vision and double exposure work is very well done. There is a great deal of realism throughout; one can almost hear the pistol shots. The final sub-title is "The Yankees Didn't Capture Santa Claus." Augustus Phillips looks well in a goatee. Little Yale Boss rendered an excellent account of himself as usual.

"Some Elopers." (Lubin. Split reel. Dec. 5.)—Arthur Johnson would have played the lead more capably than the one cast for it. Same reel with "An Interrupted Courtship." Night scenes should have been tinted.

"An Interrupted Courtship." (Lubin. Dec. 5. Split reel.)—Same reel with "Some Elopers." The best part was the bathing suit scenes, which excited admiration. As father insists on marrying the widow, his clothes are stolen. They manage anyway and all are reconciled.

"An Equal Chance." (Selig. Dec. 9.)—Two girls love the same fellow. The one, rich in worldly goods, gives some of her clothes to the other, and thus lets her win the fellow. A very pretty love story.

"The Troublesome Mole." (Biograph. Dec. 11. Split reel.)—Same reel with "A Foul and Fearful Plot." Beauty doctors and burglars both try to get rid of the mole. Some funny make-ups.

"Children of the Forest." (Essanay. Dec. 11.)—An Indian story, dealing with the period when the white people were not plentiful on the frontier. A forest fire is introduced. As is customary, a stray white man is the villain.

"A Military Judas." (Broncho. Three reels.)—A most appropriate title for a clever, well-told drama, from the pen of William H. Clifford. Although in parts the action becomes slightly conventional and time-worn, the total effect is very good. Two brothers, Jim and Jack, fighting side by side in the Civil war, are both in love with the same girl. Jim, though the unworthy one, is apparently the favored suitor. While drunk, he is prevented from shooting a man by a spy of the enemy, who obtains such a hold on him that he gains information from him regarding the movements of his army. A letter written on his brother's stationery, falls into the hands of the general. Jack court-martialed and, recognizing his brother's writing, conceals the truth. Jim, in despair, and feeling the qualms of conscience, commits suicide, first confessing his guilt. After the war is over Jack marries the girl whom both he and his brother had loved.

"Finger of Fate." (Patheplay. Dec. 18. Two parts.)—The title of this is not self-explanatory. The story is one with a strong moral and makes a worthy release. A young doctor and a girl form a fast friendship. The girl accepts an invitation to dine at the man's apartment. While waiting for her he falls asleep and dreams of what will be the inevitable end of their dinner. The vision is so realistic that he marries the girl before he will allow her to enter his house. Irving Cummings and Eleanor Woodruff play the leads. There is some excellent emotional work registered.

"Dr. Kean's Secret." (Cines-Kleine. Two parts. General Film Company Exclusive Service.)—A very interesting story which grips one by its pathos. A doctor having discovered a cure for a deadly disease, dies before he can make known his secret. One of his assistants discovers the cure in its hiding place and sells it. The other assistant discovers the formula and is able to save many lives.

"The Trail of the Snake Band." (Essanay. Dec. 18.)—The plot of this story has been worked so often before that it loses some of its interest. A man is accused of robbery because he has a hatband worn by the thief. He proves his innocence. Rena Valdez and True Boardman are the principals.

"A Son of His Father." (Lubin. Two reels. Dec. 18.)—Nothing very convincing about this story. It plays up the worn-out plot about heredity. The son inherits gambling instincts from his father. Later, having deserted his mother, the boy meets his father in the West and a reconciliation follows. There is a little romance and a fight which would be impossible anywhere.

"I Hear Her Calling Me." (Selig. Dec. 17. General Film Company Exclusive Service.)—There are many very beautiful scenes in this rather pathetic story. It is a good release. A girl is killed by a leopard, through her husband's negligence. The view of the leopard in the fight with the girl is by all odds the best of its kind ever seen by the writer.

"GUILTY!"
Courtroom scene from "Miracle Mary." (Victor 2 reels.)

INTERESTING FILM REVIEWS

Educational—Industrial—Scenic—General

"The Girl at the Lunch Counter." (Vitagraph. Dec. 19.)—A splendid comedy, with such pleasing players as John Bunny, Lillian Walker, Flora Finch, Willie Van and Kate Price. The College Widow, loved by all, marries the unexpected one, but the chap with the cash.

"The Stigma." (Essanay. Two reels. Dec. 19.)—A very good drama, the action of which is very clear and makes a good offering. Francis X. Bushman plays the lead. A girl leper escapes miraculously and is adopted by a farmer. The son learns to love the girl, but she will not tell her reason for refusing him. The truth finally becomes known and they both commit suicide.

"Who Stole Jones's Wood?" (Lubin. Dec. 19.—General Film Company Exclusive Service. Split reel.)—On the same reel with "When Cupid Took in Washing." A fairly humorous comedy in which a trap catches the one that set it.

"When Cupid Took in Washing." (Lubin. Dec. 19. Split reel. General Film Company Exclusive Service.)—A comedy love story that should get across. Because she can't get the fellow she wants, she takes in washing and so wins him.

"A Scandinavian Scandal." (Patheplay. Dec. 19.)—A roaring good slapstick comedy. One of the month's best. A servant and her unknown lover get entangled with her mistress and a jealous husband. Many unique and original situations.

"The Lure of the Road." (Selig. Dec. 19.)—A gypsy story which deserves commendation. A wanderer finds it difficult to abide a cross wife, but later returns to her. Good costuming and splendid atmosphere.

"A Christmas Story." (Vitagraph. Dec. 22.)—Very well named. Tefft Johnson so closely resembles Earle Williams, that many are confusing them. The story of Christ in the manger causes three little tots to look in their own barn and there they discover something similar. Good grouping and fine winter scenes are a great help to this picture.

"Through Flaming Paths." (Lubin. Dec. 22.)—Very similar to "Ninety and Nine." A huge forest fire must be gone through in a trolley car and the girl acts as motorman when the coward won't. The latter becomes ashamed of his lack of nerve and forms an electric circuit with his hands.

"Products of the Palm." (Edison. Dec. 22. Split reel.)—On the same reel with "Teaching His Wife a Lesson." Showing the methods of picking cocoanuts, bananas, etc., and loading same on steamships for the markets in this country. Good photography.

"Teaching His Wife a Lesson." (Edison. Dec. 22. Split reel.)—Same reel with "Products of the Palm." A very clever comedy which will be well received by everyone. Hubby warns his wife against pickpockets, then tries to teach her a practical lesson with disastrous results.

"The Open Door." (Selig. Two reels. Dec. 22.)—A good finale in this picture takes away any thoughts but those of the best. A little boy is lost as a child and after a number of years, in which he has many adventures, he lands back in his home town. He is tempted and steals the purse of a man in the public library, but decides in remorse later to return it. He does so and finds out that he is back in his old home. One inconsistency does not mar the picture.

"Pathe's Weekly No. 78." (Pathe. Dec. 22.)—An unusually interesting number of the weekly. The finding of the Mona Lisa forms an interesting item. The thrilling automobile races at Acheres, France, was also good. Photography throughout ex-

"A Dead Man's Papers." (Gaumont. Two reels.)—Not a very good offercellent.

ing. The story is good, but an attempt by the Gaumont Company to imitate the American "Western" rather spoiled it. Some spectacular shooting and a huge fire are its best features.

"Ancient Order of Good Fellows." (Vitagraph. Two reels. Dec. 20.)—Litle Audrey Berry, when asked how she was able, in this picture, to love big Hughey Mack, answered, "Because I really love him," which has nothing much to do with the story. Mack is a big policeman who gets in "bad' with the ward heeler and is given a short time in which to make good. He does this, arrests a man who is badly "wanted," and gets his promotion. Just a good-natured comedy, that is pretty sure to make everyone interested.

"The Haunted Bed Room." (Edison. Dec. 20.)—The story seems to resemble something we have seen before. A man dies, leaving some money under the flooring. His ghost haunts the room until the money is delivered to the person to which it belongs.

SCENE FROM "A MILITARY JUDAS"
(Broncho—2 reels.)

"The Conscience of Hassan Bey." (Biograph, Dec. 20.)—A suggestive story of Turkey, showing scenes in a harem, etc. There is much elaborateness about the settings. Not very realistic.

"Broncho Billy's Christmas Deed." (Essanay. Dec. 20.)—A pretty story following somewhat the lines of previous productions. G. M. Anderson, Marguerite Clayton and Harry Todd are the principals.

"The Fire Bride." (Patheplay. Dec. 20.)—Evidently a Russian or French story, photographed. Two lovers are separated, but the man drags the girl off, and holds her in a barn, where they are both burned to death. Many good scenes of peasant life are shown. A very desirable release. The photography is excellent.

"Beyond All Law." (Biograph, Dec. 18.)—A "blood and thunder" melodrama, which has, however, several redeeming features. A man manages to steal the wife of another, but she leaves him later and rejoins her husband. The latter obtains vengeance.

"The Cities of Japan." (Melies. Dec. 18.)—A full reel, dealing at length with the cities of Yokohama, Nara and Kyoto. The photography is good.

"Buster's Little Game." (Selig. Dec. 17.)—A conventional "Western" which does not seem to "get across." A cowboy, having inherited an estate, goes East and to college. He returns as a tenderfoot. Poorly trained animals mar the picture.

"Any Port in a Storm." (Vitagraph. Dec. 17.)—Good sub-titles greatly aid this picture. Two old sailors get themselves mixed up in a love affair from which they have hard work to get disentangled.

"Love or a Throne." (Imp. Dec. 25. Two parts.)—Directed by Herbert Brenon in Berlin. The story itself is conventional and possesses but little originality. A king has two sons, the eldest of whom is in love with an opera singer. Upon the king's death he refuses the throne, and abdicates in his brother's favor, thus being enabled to marry the girl.

"Animated Weekly, No. 93." (Universal, Dec. 17.)—A very fair number. As usual, the cartoons of Hy Mayer make the hit of the picture. News from the Mexican border and the catastrophe to the steamer Zulia in New York were most important items.

"Hello, Trouble." (Essanay. Dec. 17.)—A romance over the telephone between two offices in which the bosses, unfortunately for them, join. Billy Mason and Ruth Hennessey play the leads.

"Falling in Love with Inez. (Edison. Dec. 17.)—Gladys Hulette looks so splendid in this picture that all sympathize with the lovesick swains. Inez has suitors galore and her uncle kicks them all out until the football player arrives.

"Good for the Gout." (Kalem. Split reel. Dec. 17. General Film Company Exclusive Service.)—A Ruth Roland and John Brennan slapstick comedy. A father is cured of imaginary ills.

"Frayed Fagin's Adventures." (Kalem. Split reel. Dec. 19.)—Same reel with "Ulster Day in Belfast." A laughable comedy featuring John Brennan. Inconsistent in some scenes.

"Ulster Day in Belfast, Ireland." (Kalem. Split reel. Dec. 19.)—Same reel with "Frayed Fagin's Adventures." Included with the scenes from Ulster Day are the following: Fair at Stratford-on-Avon, Races at Brooklands, Conscripts in Paris, Druids in London, Sheep Fair at Winchester, and a fire in a lumber yard in London. Good photography prevails.

"The Coryphee." (Victor. Two reels. Jan. 2.)—Florence Lawrence in a dancing part always looks her best. It seems natural to her. In this story she saves a girl from a husband's wrath by throwing the blame on her own shoulders. A fine release.

BELL JOINS ALL-STARS

President Harry R. Raver, of the All-Star Feature Corporation, has completed negotiations with Digby Bell, one of America's foremost comic-opera stars and comedians, for his appearance in Augustus Thomas's "The Education of Mr. Pipp."

This will be Mr. Bell's first appearance in the silent drama. His ability as a purveyor of high comedy should be a most valuable asset in his new endeavor.

Selig Players in Bad Accident

IT is difficult to persuade the public that the scenes of photoplays are real, and that actors must necessarily undergo many ordeals to secure the effects essential for the realistic drama. The theatrical fake has been so common that the reading public regards the dangers of plunges behind the scenes with showers of salts thrown in the air to show water, or falls over beetling cliffs, three feet high, upon soft mattresses, with freedom from fear of serious results for the participants. In the motion pictures, however, it is altogether different. The actors must do things and the artificial does not serve.

Recently in Los Angeles Edward J. Le Saint, director of the Selig Polyscope Company, was staging some Western scenes in the mountains when an accident occurred which imperiled the lives of a number of people of the stock company. The famous old Concord stage, one of the prized possessions of the Edendale studio, was being driven down a winding mountain road at a high rate of speed by Art Acord when the kingbolt pulled out on a turn. As a result the front wheels were carried away and the coach was capsized.

Inside the vehicle were Stella Razeto, Arthur Blake and Joe King, and on the driver's seat with Acord, was Billy Elmer. Miss Razeto was seriously hurt, receiving several bad scalp wounds and ugly bruises, and all the others were much shaken up. After gamely requesting the rescuers, who piled down the mountainside and picked her up, to attend to the others, Miss Razetto lost consciousness.

She was whirled away to the Sisters' Hospital in one auto and King, Blake and Acord were taken away in another to have their bruises dressed

Happily all concerned are now mending. The play in which the accident occurred was "Kid Pink and the Maharajah."

MRS. W. R. HEARST FILMED

Mrs. William Randolph Hearst and her three sons were filmed by the Vitagraph Company of America at the studios on Saturday, December 20. This film was especially made for Mrs. Hearst and intended for a surprise for Mr. Hearst for Christmas. There were about ten scenes made, one showing the boys playing football on the lawn, several family groups, some very novel effects of animated portraits in frames and another showing the whole family in their limousine leaving the studios, bidding a fond farewell to A. E. Smith and thanking him for the courtesies extended and the good time they had going through the plant.

RELIANCE INCORPORATED AT $1,000,000

Incorporation papers are ready for filing in a new company, to be known as the Reliance Motion Picture Company, with a capital stock of $1,000,000, to produce dramas by great authors for the Mutual Film Corporation of New York at an estimated cost of from $25,000 to $1,000,000 apiece. Harry E. Aitken, president of the Mutual, is the organizer and head of the new concern and his associates are prominent New York and Chicago bankers.

This organization will take over the new studios of the Carlton Motion Picture Laboratories, one of which has just been completed on the estate of the late Clara Morris in Yonkers. Another, recently purchased, is the Kinemacolor studio in Los Angeles, and the third is a four-story loft building at 29 Union Square, corner of Sixteenth Street and Broadway.

All of these will be under the immediate direction of D. W. Griffith. Among the big things to be done at once are a production of "The Clansman," by Thomas Dixon; "The Escape," an eugenic drama by Paul Armstrong, and other features by Thomas Nelson Page, Ambassador to Italy; John Kendrick Bangs, George Pattullo, E. Phillips Oppenheim, Mary Roberts Rinehart, Robert H. Davis, Homer Croy and Paul West.

To get the atmosphere of the stories, the pictures will be taken in the original locale, new studios being opened next month in London and the South of France, and, so as to have them historically and scientifically correct, the leading experts, including the foremost professors of the prominent colleges of the world, will be engaged as critics.

BUY "LURE OF NEW YORK"

ACTRESS IN LION'S DEN

"With the hungry gaze of forty hungry lions fixed upon her, Kathlyn Williams, a local actress," says the Los Angeles Herald, "entered the arena of the Zoological Gardens at East Lake and stood unarmed and alone before the crouching beasts.

"Outside the arena, breathless groups of actors and newspaper representatives waited tensely; armed guards with weapons ready lurked about the danger zone with alert eyes on the hungry swarm of lions, while the motion picture camera 'turned' on a scene which few people, either in photoplay or in real life, have been called upon to witness.

"Miss Williams was undergoing but one of three terrific ordeals called for in the massive production, 'The Adventures of Kathlyn,' written for the Los Angeles actress by Harold MacGrath.

"The venture into the arena with settings royally Indian has its humorous side, grimly enough in the story, for the heroine is supposed to undergo a series of tests to avoid taking a husband to share a throne. However, the people who witnessed the splendid courage of the Selig Company's leading lady had no thought of humor. The grim reality of the scene before them precluded anything but the obvious danger of the act.

"Miss Williams is known as the nerviest woman 'in the game.' Her hair-raising escapes during the past few years seldom have crept into print, but they have been as real as her appearance among the lions.

"In the arena, where Miss Williams passed her first ordeal, as Kathlyn, were lions which had but recently entered captivity. Among them were eighteen lions just received from Hagenbeck that joined the big group already in the Selig Zoo. The scene was intense to the highest degree, while the animal men and the photographers worked frenziedly. The lions were at times uneasy and made some menacing leaps. However, the long scene was filmed successfully under the direction of F. J. Grandon."

"THE ESCAPE" SOON TO BE RELEASED

Paul Armstrong's drama, "The Escape," will soon be seen as a four-part motion picture. It is being produced by Director D. W. Griffith for the Mutual program. The appearance of this picture will be of interest, as it will not only mark the first appearance of Blanche Sweet as a Mutual star, but it will also be the first Mutual picture thus far presented actually staged by Mr. Griffith.

The cast is made up of such players as Mae Marsh, Robert Harron, Donald Crisp, Earl Foxe, C. S. Abbey and Spottiswood Aitken.

"Selling Out" in Spain

tures. French, Italian, English or American players won't do for the Spaniards. They need a favorite of their own blood, who understands their emotions, their sense of humor, and can translate it all into pictures.

A clever manufacturer could hire a good company of Spanish comedians very cheaply, train them and develop them into a company which would produce native pictures that undoubtedly would draw all the business away from the shows which rely upon second-hand, cast-off and worn-out reels. The motion picture world of Spain is ten years behind the times, and a shrewd manager who could bring out a Bunny or Billy Quirk in native talent would be sure of a fortune.

Spain is an ideal spot for the camera man, but so far it has been comparatively overlooked. Quaint sets and pictures abound. The Cines stock has a large company working in Seville at present with good results, and Pathé Freres have several companies of players in different parts of Sunny Spain, but it is doubtful if the Spaniards themselves will see all these pictures that are being made in their country, or if they will care for them peopled with foreign actors.

There is no film censorship in Spain, which makes it an open field for pictures which fail to pass elsewhere. Spain doesn't believe in censorship in anything. The few popular magazines they have are full of photos that would make Anthony Comstock start raiding at once.

It's a free country in the way of morals, and many a picture gets by in Spain which would be stopped in puritanical America. Another reason that censorship is not needed in Spain is that very few children go to the theatre. There are no five-cent tickets for children in the land of the Dons. They pay full price or nothing at all, and you can't see a dozen even at a matinee.

The grown-ups like blood-and-thunder pictures as well as comics. They fall hard for the Western picture, even if taken in Spain. The other night I saw a thrilling Western drama cribbed from some California company's reel and reproduced in Spain. Oxen were substituted for steers and goats for sheep, but the people here didn't know the difference, and thought the whole thing was happening on the wild ranges of Western America.

* * * *

JUST now the three-reel picture of Christopher Columbus from America is making a big hit. Here it is called "Cristobal Colon," and everybody shouts and sighs over all the dramatic scenes. The Spanish audience is very temperamental and appreciative.

Smoking isn't allowed in the theatres, but everybody smokes just the same. They have two firemen sitting down front who look like Boy Scouts and wear Hessian soldier uniforms. There's never been a fire in a picture house in Spain of any importance, but somebody has to pay the salaries of the city firemen, so they put it up to the exhibitor.

In spite of bad conditions there are good opportunities awaiting Americans here. American films are the most popular. The people want them, and before long they're going to have plenty. There is a good chance awaiting the man who comes to Madrid or Barcelona with good connections and starts a big show out-of-doors. Spaniards have an ideal climate and love to be outdoors, but so far they've never heard of an open-air theatre. In summer the heat is unbearable and the people practically live in the streets at night, looking for a cool place. A big picture place open to the stars would be an acceptable innovation that would pay dividends.

Café life is very popular in the big cities, and if motion pictures were combined with cafés, somewhat after the fashion of Coney Island and American resorts, the exhibitor could make good profits. But a big city would have to be picked for such a venture, and Spain hasn't many big cities. The two most progressive are Madrid and Barcelona. At Barcelona the business methods are almost American and the people have more money to spend than in any other city in Spain, except the Capital, Madrid.

Spain needs motion picture promoters, but to make a profitable start in this land of the siesta a man must study the conditions and know the people. There are chances all along the line, for manufacturer, exchange man and exhibitor, but the people will have to be educated and developed to a point where they will look for something better than they are now getting.

Viva la Spain! But if you come over you'd better bring along a property pistol and make up your mind to fight King Alfonso and his taxes to the last ditch.

of the pictures on this program will be shown in the city for six weeks after being shown in the theatre securing the contract. Advertising can now be done a full two weeks ahead and exhibitors do not care who knows what their program is going to be, since no one can infringe upon it. This may be old news to the larger United States cities but it is new here and marks the era of the keen competition among the thirty local houses.

The advantage to the manufacturer, who can ship films without the expense of the long haul and without the tiresome "hold-up" which is of such frequent occurrence at the Custom House, without the customary deposit of thirty-three and one-third per cent, which ties up much cash and without many of the attendant customs house evils which arise, is obvious. But obvious as it is, no one has yet chosen to take advantage of it and give to Canadians what Canadians want.

* * * *

HOW much fiums suffer from the local censors can best be told by the film agencies. The number tells of the eager and sometimes mistaken energy of the holder of a pair of sharp scissors. These films are censored in almost every city and as no two censors have the same moral standards the films suffer even to the slicing off of sub-titles. The exchanges in Canada can tell the exchanges in the United States about it, if they have not already found out for themselves.

What better example of catering to the public wants could be had than the recent production of "Moths" at the Province theatre in Winnipeg, a film which featured Maude Fealy. The Province was jammed to its doors for two days. Not by those who wished to see "Moths" alone, but by those who wished to see "Moths" with Maude Fealy in the leading role. Miss Fealy had played two seasons in stock in Winnipeg and was well known to its theatre-goers.

Broaden this idea of catering to the millions or even the tens of thousands, broaden it to a Dominion-wide subject and the results will be proportionately equal if not greater.

"Why then," asks some one, "do not Canadians go in for manufacturing and producing?"

Surely the manufacturers can themselves best answer this query. Would the Canadian film find a market among the present output? Would the Canadian find a market for his wares under conditions as they now exist?

Every city in Canada is controlled by two or three film agencies, which in their turn are controlled by United States manufacturers. At least, that is the general view of the situation in Western Canada to-day. It requires large capital to organize and launch such a concern in the face of things as they seem to exist. But this will not always be, although necessarily, it must be some years before the Canadian industry can hope to approach the present excellence of the film production in the United States, much less prove a competitor.

* * * *

IN the meanwhile, should not the masters of the industry consider the Canadian field? Looking at it from a purely business point of view it seems that they should. Canada each year more loudly demands Canadian pictures. not so much just now pictures of Canadian manufacture but pictures of Canadian subjects.

"Ivanhoe," produced by the Universal, did the greatest business in the history of any of the Canadian theatres that used it, and at an increased price for admission. Its success was because it was an international subject and of British international interest more than all.

It is foolish to say that pictures cannot be taken in Canada. In Manitoba, for instance, there are annually more hours per diem of sunshine than in any other part of the globe—India, Africa and Australia included. The air is clear and fine, the days perfect, the winter dry and cold, and the conditions ideal for in- and out-of-door photography.

There are many places, cities and towns located on railroad divisional points which offer especial inducements to manufacturers of all kinds in order to get them to settle. Free sites and grants are common. But the day of cheap sites and free grants are on the wane. Canada is becoming more thickly populated; in proportion the demand for Canadian pictures for Canadians is increasing, and those first on the ground, necessarily, will reap the greatest advantages.

The tremendous power of motion picture photography has not even to-day been estimated. It has become one of the greatest powers of amusement and education in the world. How easily it could be made to weld the love and friendship of two great nations together.

NO DEPRESSION IN MOTION PICTURE INDUSTRY

Business depression is an unknown term in the motion picture industry, according to news gleaned from the dividend columns of the daily papers.

The Mutual Film Corporation announces its regular monthly dividend No. 8, as one-half of one per cent, with an extra dividend of one-half of one per cent on the common stock.

The New York Motion Picture Corporation, which manufactures pictures for the Mutual program, announces the seventh monthly dividend as one per cent on its capital stock and an extra dividend of one per cent thereon. Both of these notices are signed by Charles J. Hite, treasurer of the Thanhouser Company.

THE LURE OF NEW YORK

The International Feature Film Corporation, Ltd., of Montreal, Canada, has bought from the New York Film Company, through arrangements with Mr. Dauzier, the manager, the Canadian rights for "The Lure of New York" and all other releases made by the company.

STEREOSCOPIC MOTION PICTURES ON THE SCREEN

In reference to our article on this subject in a recent issue of the Motion Picture News, a well-known experimentalist writes us as follows:

"I am not in agreement with the quite definite opinion expressed in your article to the effect that motion pictures in stereoscopic relief are physically, or even practically, impossible. This opinion is based on some considerable study of the general stereoscopic phenomena and on some tests with apparatus of my own construction showing lantern slides projected so that they could be observed stereoscopically by a number of observers, the apparatus for doing this being of my own devising, but depending on no fundamentally new principles.

I am not prepared to describe in detail what I consider the most desirable combination of apparatus to accomplish satisfactory stereoscopic projection, as I believe I should first make some patent applications on some of the devices which I have constructed and which I have in mind. Also I may say that while I am satisfied that there is nothing impossible in such stereoscopic projection of moving pictures, I am not so certain that development and exploitation of the system would be necessarily successful, partly on account of the additional expense and complication, and largely on account of the present imperfections in simple motion picture projection. By this last, I refer to the unfortunate fact that nine-tenths of the moving pictures shown are technically and optically not up to the highest standard, so that it seems fair to make the general statement that the better class of people avoid motion picture shows on account of the strain of the eye which it experiences, apart from any considerations of the nature of the action depicted."

We hope that in course of time our correspondent will favor the readers of the Motion Picture News with his ideas on this subject. We cannot blame him for his reticence, as it is too frequently the case that the publication of original ideas is destructive to commercial success.

Film Quality

Quality in the film—quality from a technical photographic standpoint is as important to the Exhibitor as is interest in the story that the film tells.

There's one film that's recognized the world over as the standard of quality — that is always used by those whose effort it is to give the Exhibitors the very best goods and the very best service—Eastman film.

And it is identifiable. Look for "Eastman" on the perforated margin.
